At least thirteen former Federal pitchers are now making good in the American and National Leagues.

The poor Federal players won't last long when they get into real fast company," said the skeptic when the players of the defunct league were named up by the two old major organizations before the opening of the present season. But their skepticism has not been borne out by the results. Here is what some of the former Federals are doing now:

Culllop, former pitcher with the Kansas City Feds, now pitching .800 with the New York Yankees.

Hal Chase, who first batted for the Buffalo Federals is now hitting .307 for the Cincinnati Feds.

Albin, the former Pittsburgh Federal with an average of .259.

Rousch of the Newark Feds, now outfielding for the Cincinnati Reds is hitting around .310.

Ed Konetchy, former Pittsburgh Federal, now playing first base with the Boston Braves is slugging the ball at .260.

Marsans, the little Cuban outfielder who played with the St. Louis Feds last year and is now with the Browns, is slugging the pill at about .256.

Bill Rariden, the Giants' catcher who was with the Newark Feds last year is hitting around .242.

Black, the Chicago Cub outfielder, who was brought over with the most of the Chicago Federal team is hitting .259.

Making good? Yes, sir

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING WANTED

Prominent Men Endorsing the Idea of the National Security League.

New York, Sept. 11.—Emphatic commendation of the campaign of the National Security League to impress the American people with the vital necessity of adopting a system of universal military training and service has been received at the headquarters of the league in letters from prominent men throughout the United States. These letters emphasize the fact that the adoption of such a system would improve the physical development of American youths; would stimulate a spirit of patriotism and would insure a democratic blending together of all classes of people. The assertion of the National Security League is that universal military training and service is the basic foundation of real preparedness and this view is echoed by men whose judgment, wisdom and experience is everywhere acknowledged.

For instance, former President Chas. W. Eliot of Harvard believes that the question whether the United States ought to adopt the principle of universal military service is the most important one which can be presented to the country for discussion in connection with preparedness, while Dr. Lyman Abbott, of New York, urges the league to educate the people to an understanding that universal military service will not convert the United States into a huge standing army. "We need over and over again," he says, "to explain the difference between a democratic nation equipped for self-defense and a nation converted into an armed camp."

Brooks Adams, of Boston, whose great work, "The Law of Civilization and Decay," has been translated into German, French and Russian, and who is regarded as one of the most thoughtful men in the country, is a strong advocate of universal military training and service because he thinks it will develop in the American people the highest form of administrative competence. Instead of being a waste of time, he estimates that universal service would double the relative productive individual capacity of our people in ten years and would easily quadruple our collective power. He thinks that the physical development alone would be a great National asset.

The same point of view is expressed by Judge Henry Stockbridge, of the Maryland Court of Appeals, who says that he is especially interested in seeing measures taken toward a compulsory universal military service. "I believe in this," he says, "not merely as a matter of war preparedness but as being about the best training that we can give our young men of today, looking to their health and inculcating an essential too often lost sight of, viz.: discipline and obedience; teaching them the value of team work rather than individual effort."

The patriotic value of such a system is emphasized by United States senator James W. Wadsworth, Jr., of New York, who says that for many months he has been convinced "that the only practical and permanent remedy for the condition which handicaps us in assuring National defense is the establishment of a system of universal and compulsory military tem is emphasized by United States senator James W. Wadsworth, Jr., of New York, who says that for many months he has been convinced "that the only practical and permanent remedy for the condition which handicaps us in assuring National defense is the establishment of a system of universal and compulsory military training." He says that the training of large numbers of young men for military service will go far toward inspiring them with a National patriotic spirit and a better understanding of National aspirations. Senator George E. Chamberlain, of Oregon, chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, expresses the same view when he says that it is absolutely necessary to instill a patriotic spirit as the foundation for preparedness and efficiency and if that spirit is cultivated to its highest development universal military training will be made a part of our educational system in State and Nation.

Emerson McMillin, of New York, who has done so much for the development of military aviation in this country, agrees with Colonel Wm. C. Church, editor of the Army and Navy Journal, when he says that the operation of universal military service should be the chief subject of discussion in connection with preparedness because "we cannot safely rely upon
