hostile reconnoitering detachments and compelled the British to engage strong bodies, which suffered heavy losses in artillery and rifle fire. These small German rear guards again blocked the way of the British by tenacious and desperate resistance, using every bit of covering and sallying forth in surprise attacks from crater and remnants of trenches. "This tenacious defense forced the British to move ahead their batteries, but the heavy German artillery was ready. Thus, a British battery attempting to fix itself near Butte de Warlencourt on February 27, was shot to pieces in a short time.
