HERO FOR EVERY WORLD'S SERIES

Who Will Win the Big Honors in This Year's Clash?

(By H. C. Hamilton, United Press Staff Correspondent).

New York, Sept. 25.—Some youth probably languishing now on a bench is going to find his name blazoned through out the country before long. Somebody now wearing a Giant's or a White Sox uniform is going to be proclaimed a hero.

Every world's series has had its hero—from the very start of the thing to the present day. Sometimes he is more of a hero than at others, but always he intrudes himself into the scheme of things.

Who of the present generation of fans will ever forget the brilliant 1909 achievement of Babe Adams in winning the world's series from Detroit almost single handed for Pittsburgh?

Likewise, what generation of baseball fans ever will pause to ask why Frank Baker won his title of "Home Run" Baker?

Joe Bush of the Athletics, George Rohe of the White Sox, have had their hero days.

Bush a green kid stopped the Giants dead and made it possible for his team to win the world's championship. Rhode filled in at third base for the White Sox when they met the Cubs in the World's series and, although the Cub's attack was centered on this youth, he finished with a brilliant fielding record and an astounding hitting record.

Harry Hooper, one day in 1912, ran back to the ropes that held the crowd off the playing field in the final game of the 1912 world's series. Larry Doyle had cracked one hard enough for home run, but Hooper, by a marvelous jump and a stab into the crowd, caught the ball and plunged headlong into the crowd. He saved the ball once.

Hank Gowdy got so many hits in the 1912 world's series that they are still talking about it in Boston—and wondering why. For Hank, before and after, has only been a so-so hitter, never doing more than just ordinary execution with his maul.
