NEUTRALS TO SUFFER MOST AFTER WAR

(By United Press.)
Paris, Sept. 20.—(By mail).—Floating mines and unexploded torpedoes will for a long time after peace has been concluded be a danger to shipping in all parts of the world.

Charles Nordman in Le Matin mentions that recently a ship of the Cape of Good Hope by striking a mine which had been drifted there from European waters, and recalls the fact that over a year after the fall of Port Arthur a Japanese steamer struck a floating mine and sank off Honolulu, while the cause will be common to all nations, more or less, Mr. Nordman affirms that neutral countries are likely to suffer most from this aftermath of the great war. The reasons he alleges is the following: Sea currents, which have an average speed of 12 miles an hour, have a tendency to follow the same course, and it has already been noticed that they are bearing mines towards certain neutral zones. The currents of the Baltic enter the North Sea by Jutland, striking the German coast and finally reaching the Swedish coast. In reascends towards Scandinavia after skirting Holland and Denmark. Spanish waters would also suffer as the currents in the Bay of Biscay sets towards the northern Spanish coast.

In the three years of war nearly 1,000 Scandinavian ships have been torpedoed or mined, and 600 sailors killed.

The Washington monument in the national capital, the highest structure of its kind in the world, consists of 10,000 blocks of granite each one 100 tons.

Five hundred Y. M. C. A. centers have been established in France since the beginning of the war.

Last year 1,051 persons were killed and 5,589 injured in railroad accidents in Great Britain.
