[From "Household Words.] A STOCKING FULL OF BANK

Some years ago-in the days of the thirty-shilling notes-a certain Irishman saved up the sum of eighty-seven pounds ten in notes of the Bank of Ireland. As a sure means of securing this valuable property, he put it in the foot of an old stocking, and buried it out when wanted, in the best peserva-

After leaving his treasure in its excellent'place of deposit for some months, it occurred the depositor to take a look at it and see how it was getting on .-He found the stocking-foot apparently full of the fragments of mildew and broken mushroons. No other shadow of a shade of eighty-seven pounds ten! In the midst of his despair, the man had the sense not to disturb the ashes of his property. He took the st c ing-foot in has hand, posted off to the Bank in Dublin, entered it one morning as soon as it was opened, and staring at the clerk with a most extraordinary absence of all expression in his face, said-"Ah, look at that; sir! To this prudent proposal the Bank of Ireland readily assented, being extremely anxious that the man should not be a loser, but, of course, deeming it esseu-

The son readily understood the delicate commission proposed to him.— He detached the fragments from the stocking with the utmost care, on the point of a penknife; laid the whole presently saw them, to his delight, begin to unfold and expand like flowers.
