Given 2 Years in Jail For Setting Fire to Woods

According to an announcement by Joseph C. Kircher, Regional Forester for the Southern Region of the United States Forest Service, Luda Kirk of Chuckey, Greene County, Tenn., has been given a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment for wilfully setting fire to timber within the boundaries of the Pisgah National Forest.

Kircher said the severity of Kirk's sentence would probably have a beneficial effect in curbing woods burning in western North Carolina and eastern Tennessee where the government owns millions of acres of national forest land. In the past, he said, sentence for similar offenses has usually been merely a small fine or imprisonment for a couple of months.

Government foresters estimate damages from forest fires in the South at approximately $47,000,000 for the three-year period from 1931 to 1934.
