North Carolina Is Good Place To Raise Hogs

North Carolina is well adapted to hog production, according to Earl H. Hostetler, professor of animal husbandry at State college.

The state has many advantages, he said, and three are particularly outstanding: temperate climate, nearness to market, and a good supply of protein supplements.

In the temperate climate, each sow can farrow two litters of pigs each year without her owner having to provide expensive housing during these critical periods.

However, some housing is necessary, Hostetler said, to protect them from the cold and rain in February and March and from the heat in August and September, the two best farrowing periods.

Corn is the cheapest and most satisfactory carbonaceous feed for fattening hogs, and plenty of corn is available in this State. Last year, more than one-fourth of North Carolina's crop land was in corn.

To get the best results, in feeding, some nitrogenous or high protein feed must be fed with the corn. And here again North Carolina has an advantage in being able to secure fish meal, cottonseed meal, peanut meal, and soybean oil meal produced in the state.
