

Contour Furrows Can Be Made With Plows

Contour furrows, recommended by the agricultural extension service and the soil conservation service to prevent erosion in pastures can be constructed, after the contour lines have been staked off around the hillside, by throwing four furrows together with a two-horse turning plow.

After seeding, the furrows should be blocked off every 25 or 30 feet so that, in case a furrow should run over at one place, all the water would not drain out of the furrow and form a gully.

Good broad-base terraces recommended by the soil conservation service and the State college extension service can be built with team power if the farmer has patience to stick with the terraces until they come up to specifications. This has been amply demonstrated on the farm of R. R. Webster in the Madison demonstration area at Reidsville. It took Webster and his four mules only about four days to build more than a mile of terraces, protecting 10 acres of good land.
