

Old-Age Insurance Will Be Paid Regardless Of Income

Old-age insurance benefits will be paid to workers who are entitled to payment, regardless of property or other income.

Any amount of earnings (up to $3,000 in a single year from a single employer) may be placed to a worker's credit on his social security account, will entitle him to a corresponding credit toward old-age insurance benefits. Whether he owns a great deal of property or none at all, makes no difference, whatever, in the matter of old-age insurance. For example, a labor foreman, has invested his savings in a farm. He continues to work as an employee of a construction company for seven years after 1936, earns wages amounting to several thousand dollars, reaches the age of 65 and retires to live on his farm. No matter what his farm is worth nor how much money he makes from his crops, he will receive a government check for old-age insurance, every month, the rest of his life. He might own a store or a sawmill or a bank, but if he is entitled to old-age insurance under the social security act, he will get the monthly check, just the same.

The beneficiary of an insurance policy may receive old-age insurance. A worker who collects rent from houses, that he owns, may receive old-age insurance. An employee, who is entitled to old-age insurance benefits, may operate his own store, if he sees fit. Income from another source does not affect the payment of old-age insurance when the employee is entitled to such benefits.

Under another title of the social security act—known as "old-age assistance," there may be some regulation concerning property ownership. But that is up to the individual states. Some states have a property clause in their public assistance laws, some do not. It is intended that money for old-age assistance should go to those in actual need. But the question of need or of property ownership does not affect the payment of old-age insurance one way or the other.
