Thirteen Southern National Forests are Being Developed Macon Frank

Vacationists visiting the Southern National Forests during the summer are urged by the officials of the U. S. Forest Service to do more than "see the sights." Spectacular vistas of verdant valleys and breath-taking views of the towering mountains of the Blue Ridge, Ozark, and Ouachita chains are so impressive that the beholder is apt to overlook the commercial importance of forests.

Recreationists are reminded that the 13 National Forests of the South, containing nine million acres of government owned mountain and forest land, are being developed so that all of their resources, not just their natural beauty, will serve the public. Mile after mile of forest covered slopes and plains stand as monuments to the forest fire fighting effectiveness of the thousands of CCC enrollees led by state and federal forest officers. Steel lookout towers atop a hundred peaks are the points of vantage from which fire guards keep constant vigil to protect the National Forests-the public's forests -from their arch enemy-FIRE!

Water is one of the most important natural resources, Forest covered slopes give rise to rivulets that join to make creeks, that flow together to form rivers, that produce water power, bear commerce, and, in so many ways, contribute cities are dependent upon the regulated flow of water from forested areas for their domestic supply.
