All Plans Completed For Farm Convention

Five full days of education and entertainment are in store for rural men and women who attend State college's 36th annual farm and home week, July 31-August 4.

With advance registrations already above last year's mark at the same time, State college officials believe this year's attendance will smash all previous records.

Upon payment of the registration fee of one dollar, either in advance or on arrival at the college Monday, July 31, the visitor will be entitled to a room in one of the college dormitories for the entire week. Meals may be obtained in the college cafeteria for 75 cents to $1 a day.

This year's program has been lightened considerably, John W. Goodman and Miss Ruth Current, of the State college extension service, said. More stress will be placed on things to see rather than things to hear.

Toward this end, the college staff has arranged a multitude of exhibits and displays that is expected to give visitors a picture of modern, scientific farming and home-making. For instance, the men will see elaborate displays of farm machinery, while the women will see model kitchens and labor-saving devices.
