Construction Reaches Normal Capacity On Dam Project

Construction activities on the Nantahala dam project reached normal capacity this week, following the nine-day shut-down which was terminated last Friday morning at 8 o'clock.

It could not be ascertained how many of the Northern workers, who left the job for fear of violence, had returned to work but a number of out-state workers are now employed on the dam site. The project was closed down by the Utah construction company, contractors for the dam which is being built by the Nantahala Power and Light company here, when local groups threatened to drive off the Northern workers.

A move to prevent further discontent was seen in the announcement by the American Federation of Labor that hereafter Harold Dalrymple of Franklin would represent workers on the Nantahala job, Dalrymple was formerly union representative on the Glenville project, a Macon county job, well liked by his associates.

The workers returned to the project after a mass meeting last Thursday at which Forrest H. Shuitor, state commissioner of labor, read a letter from Governor Hoyt assuring protection to both North Carolina and out-of-state workers. George Putnam, project superintendent, and James Turner, representative of the International Union of Operating Engineers of the American Federation of Labor, also spoke, urging harmony and cooperation.

Fontana Project Granted A Rehearing Before Commission

The proposed Fontana hydro-electric project on the Little Tennessee river will be given a rehearing before the Federal Power commission on January 15, in Washington, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Washington yesterday.

The Nantahala Power and Light company requested a rehearing before the commission after that body had turned down their request for a license to build the dam.

Company To Present Data

The commission's finding November 5 that interstate commerce would be affected by construction of the Fontana project blocked the company's proposal to build a 470-foot earth-rock dam at Fontana. The commission held the river navigable and declared that the power dam would alter steam conditions below it.

The petition asked the opportunity to present additional data in support of the company's claims, and additional information on plans for the project, including a provision for increased storage capacity during abnormal flood conditions.

The company claims the dam would aid in development and regulation of the Tennessee river system, which already possesses something of a gigantic network of power dam projects.

It listed plans for the Knoxville Power company, also a subsidiary of the Aluminum company, for construction of Chilhowee dam, a hydro-electric development on the Little Tennessee downstream from Fontana.

The Nantahala Power and Light company announced several weeks ago that it was ready to proceed at once with the construction of the dam on favorable action by the power commission.
