

State College Answers Timely Farm Questions

Q. How should I go about controlling cow pox?
 A. Dr. C. D. Grinnells, veterinarian for the Agricultural Experiment Station at State College, suggests that you segregate the infected animals from the remainder of the herd and arrange for a separate caretaker for these animals, if possible. In mild cases he suggests cleanliness in milking by dipping the teats after each milking in chlorine solution. Tincture of iodine in glycerine of equal parts is also useful. When cow pox is neglected the disease often becomes a predisposing cause to mastitis, an inflammation of the udder, which is the dairyman's No. 1 problem.

Q. What is the best kind of poultry litter?

A. Prof. Roy S. Dearstyne, head of the Poultry Department at State College, says that ground corn cobs is one of the best types of litter available on the farm and that no poultryman should lose the opportunity of building up a supply of this type of litter. While not the best, wood shavings provide acceptable litter and poultrymen near a sawmill can depend on this supply. "It's bad to run out of litter in mid-winter and now's the time to provide a full supply," Dearstyne says.

Farmers Cooperate In Home Fruit Plan

In all sections of North Carolina farm families are cooperating in home fruit projects on a community basis, and these activities are proving very successful. Mother and father, and all the 4-H members work together to produce an extra supply of small fruits for the family. Then all the families in the community follow the standard plan, which is agreed upon at a general meeting.

Everybody grows the same fruit or fruits, and each swaps information with the other. It's a community affair.

The idea was first suggested by H. R. Niswonger, in charge of Extension horticulture at State College. In the counties the farm and home agents are cooperating to put it into operation in key communities.

Most of the communities are growing only strawberries; or strawberries, grapes, and raspberries or dewberries; or strawberries with apples, peaches, sour cherries, and figs (in the eastern part of the State). Some communities are also including blueberries, where soil conditions are suitable.

"As a starter, the plans should be simple so that every-

Larger Supply Of Corn Hybrid Seed

The supply of corn hybrid seed will be considerably larger next year because 207 farmers have produced about 15,000 bushels of 12 adapted corn hybrids during the past season under the direction of the N. C. Crop Improvement Association and the Agricultural Experiment Station at State College. This is enough seed to plant about 120,000 acres, or 19 per cent of North Carolina's corn acreage.

A. D. Stuart, Extension seed specialist, says that 133 of the 207 farmers are apprentice growers with one-fourth acre each, learning the rudiments of the business. The other 74 farmers are certified growers.

The certified growers in many cases artificially dry the corn to prevent damage from insects and disease. The seed are then cleaned, graded, tested for both germination and purity, and sealed in new bags with a certificate tag signed by the grower.

Of the 12 hybrids produced by the farmers, 8 were yellow and 4 were white. Both top crosses and double crosses were made. Top crosses are designated as "T" hybrids and are produced by crossing the farmer's own corn on see obtained from the breeding program of N. C. State College and the USDA Bureau of Plant Industry.

"The use of adapted corn hybrid seed will provide North Carolina with more feed for peace time living," Stuart says. "A list of the certified corn growers will be published in December and a copy of this list may be obtained by writing the Crop Improvement Association, State College, Raleigh."

Plan now to set about 100 to 200 strawberry plants in the home garden. Raspberries, dewberries, and grapes can also be added.

one can understand them," Niswonger says. "It's family and community cooperation that does the job. Generally two meetings are held each year—the first when the fruits are planted, and the second along in July or August when the results of the work may be measured."

Niswonger has suggested that home demonstration clubs, neighborhood leaders, and 4-H club members take the lead in establishing these home fruit projects. Cooperation between all the families in a given community is the key to success.
