One Of Most Dangerous Occupations

"Doing farm chores is five times as dangerous as deep-sea diving, flying a plane, or being a steeplejack," a New York Power and Light corporation official has declared.

Mentioning that 6,000 people were killed in farm accidents last year, Cecil T. Walker, of Albany, N. Y., said that "carelessness and lack of safety measures on farms and in homes are the causes of many accidents." Mr. Walker spoke on the General Electric Farm Paper of the Air program over WGY.

"There are many more accidents from falling over things, being hurt by livestock and being careless with tools and machinery than from electricity," he pointed out.

"But it is possible to be hurt by electricity or electrical appliances, to get a shock or start a fire. Poor lighting, poor wiring, or poor judgment in placing or using electrical appliances are among the major causes of accidents involving electrical appliances."

Says Every Farm Owner Should Give Welcome To Beavers

Every farmer should welcome beavers, Mrs. Dorothy B. Richards, of Little Falls, N. Y., declared in a General Electric of the air address. She has raised beavers and observed their habits for several years.

Beavers "will build you a pond if you have a stream with brush growing along its banks," Mrs. Richards told her farm audience. "Their ponds conserve water, prevent floods, catch the valuable topsoil washed down from the land, and provide a habitat for fish, muskrats, ducks and other interesting forms of wildlife. Of course, they might kill a few trees by flooding, but their food consists mostly of what is called 'brush'—poplar, willow, and dogwood."

Mrs. Richards said she "can't think of a single bad quality" beavers possess. "They are patient, kind and gentle with their own kind and with the smaller, weaker wild creatures that are attracted to their ponds," she explained.

"Beavers have many human traits, and are self conscious, have a sense of humor, and plan their activities six months to a year in advance," Mrs. Richards said.
