Walter Burch Has Object He Thinks Must Be Meteorite

Walter M. Burch this week brought to The Press office something he believes to be a meteorite.

The stone-like object is almost black in color and is very heavy. Approximately a cube in shape, it measures only about 13 inches in girth, but weighs six and a half pounds.

Mr. Burch said he obtained it from a Negro man, who had picked it up in the Clark's Chapel vicinity. It is on display in the front window at The Press.

night before he was found dead in a nearby road, by Marcell Wood and David Mashburn, not David Buchanan. And he had made his home with Mr. and Mrs. Grady Mashburn, not Mr. and Mrs. Grady Henry. The errors are regretted, and The Press is glad to make the corrections.

About one out of every five persons in the U. S. lives on a farm.

FOR WANT OF A NAIL . . .

Nearly two hundred years ago Benjamin Franklin wrote the famous lines about how a kingdom was lost . . . because a battle was lost . . . because a rider was lost . . . because his horse was lost . . . because a shoe was lost . . . and all for want of a nail.

We keep thinking of those lines whenever we're asked what's holding up production of the new Chevrolet cars. You see, it requires more than 8,000 parts to build an automobile, and if a shortage of material prevents production of just one of these parts, then production of the entire car is halted.

For want of a nail? Yes, it's almost literally that. Of the 8,000 parts in a Chevrolet, about 2,500 of these are nuts and bolts alone! The production men at Chevrolet tell us that nuts and bolts are hard to obtain just now, and are shipped by special planes to assembly plants all over the country whenever a source for these vital parts is found.

At ten o'clock one morning it was learned that Fisher Body plants at Kansas City and St. Louis would be forced to shut down the following morning if a supply of window channels was not available by seven a. m. These parts were at a plant in Amesbury, Massachusetts, and none of the passenger airliners had doors big enough to admit the long channels.

Arrangements were finally made for a C-47 cargo plane to fly from Chicago to Boston to pick up the channels trucked there from Amesbury. The 9,000 pounds of channels were then flown to Kansas City and St. Louis, and Chevrolet bodies continued to move out of the plants.

Hoods have been flown from Flint to Kansas City; fenders from St. Louis to California. These daily air-cargo shipments are a part of the vast Chevrolet plan to move parts, the minute they are available, into plants where shortages exist—to move them there fast, so that those plants can keep operating.

Another ingenious step taken to help beat the materials shortages was at a Chevrolet foundry in Saginaw. Pig iron was low, a scheduled shipment had not arrived, and a shut-down seemed certain. Then someone suggested exploring the river bottom with an electromagnet near the docks where pig iron had been unloaded for many years. Seventy tons of iron were brought up, enough to keep the plant running until the late shipment arrived.

Chevrolet wants you to receive delivery of your new Chevrolet complete. The men who build your cars refuse to relax Chevrolet's high standards by allowing cars to come off the assembly line without bumpers or seats—and of course cars can't be built at all unless materials are available to produce vital parts. Chevrolet often has to hold up production entirely because some tiny part cannot be obtained.

Even so, you can see that Chevrolet is doing everything possible to speed delivery of the new Chevrolet for which you have waited so patiently.

If you have had to wait, it is because Chevrolet, too, has had to wait . . . all for want, perhaps, of a nail.
