Handicapped Need Not Ask Public's Aid

If the salesman at your door appeals to you to buy his magazines or other merchandise because he is blind or crippled and needs help in raising money for an operation or medical treatment, think twice before you reach for your purse, advises the State Board of Public Welfare.

Many persons are making direct appeals by exploiting the sympathy of well persons for handicapped individuals or the sympathy of adults for extremely young salesmen, welfare officials say.

For several years certain publishing or magazine subscription firms have exploited crippled persons and the North Carolina public by using physically handicapped salesmen. In this method of sales the sales appeal is based on the solicitor's handicap and need for charitable assistance for corrective treatment, rather than a valid sales appeal based on the merits of the magazine offered and its value to the subscriber.

For a number of years both the federal and state governments have maintained a program of vocational rehabilitation for the physically handicapped, which was intensified and expanded with the enactment of the federal social security measures.

During the last year or so the program of rehabilitation has been further liberalized by expanding the age limits and providing operative treatment, to some extent, so that every handicapped individual may have the maximum help of local, state and federal resources in physical restoration and vocational education. Thus it is unnecessary for any individual to make an appeal to the public to buy magazines in order to help him secure funds to finance hospital treatment for the correction of his crippled condition, officials of the State Board of Public Welfare point out.
