Study Indicates Undernourished's Teeth Are Better

A study showing only about 30 per cent as much tooth decay among badly nourished people as among well nourished is published in the Journal of the American Dental Association by Louis S. Block of Louisville.

He studied the cases of 223 patients. Of these, 124 were known to be deficient in nutrition. These malnourished had an average of 2.07 tooth surfaces decayed; 1.60 teeth missing; and 0.96 tooth surfaces filled.

The well nourished had an average of 3.21 surfaces decayed; 2.23 teeth missing; and 9.75 tooth surfaces restored. Dr. Block said this gave the malnourished an incidence of decay burn, Emmitt Dills, and Herbert Bateman.
