TIMBER SUPPLY MAY BE RUINED, LITTLE GAINED

Selective Tree Marking
And Cutting Has Proved Worth

Tempted to unload their timber stock while prices are high, many Tar Heel farmers not only are ruining their future timber crop but also are losing money by rushing to sell at the first opportunity, believes John L. Gray, assistant extension forester at State college.

As an example, Mr. Gray says many farmers agree to sell every tree above a certain size, often specifying a 10-inch stump diameter limit or even smaller. In most cases, he points out, this is equal to setting no limit at all, since most trees below this size will not make one 14- or 16-foot sawlog large enough to saw out a clean 2 x 4.

According to Mr. Gray, two Edgecombe county farmers have found by experience that selective marking and cutting of trees improves their timber stand for future use and also enables them to obtain maximum income from their sales.

Assisted by Mr. Gray, the farmers checked their entire 100 acres of timberland. Each tree to be sold was marked with two spots of yellow paint, one at the stump line for checking purposes and the other about shoulder high on the trunk for the convenience of the cutters. A record was kept of the board-foot content of each tree.

They invited all buyers to make offers, and the best one was accepted. Terms of the sale were covered in a written contract which protected the unmarked trees by placing a double price on them.

Now, even though one good sale has been made, fine, straight, thrifty trees still cover the woods to grow to premium size and to seed the openings in with young trees.
