Bee Colonies

In N. C. Increased Beyond Goal

North Carolina beekeepers increased the number of their bee colonies by 14,000 this year, and thus attained the distinction of being the only state group in the country to meet their suggested goal as set by the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

Figures just released by the bureau of agricultural economics show that the number of bee colonies in the Old North State increased from 173,000 in 1947 to 187,000 this year. The suggested goal was 177,000.

Alabama, with an increase of 10,000 colonies, had the second best record in the nation. Most of the northern states had fewer colonies this year than last.

W. A. Stephen, extension beekeeper at State college, said the North Carolina record speaks well for the future of agriculture.

"Bees are necessary for the pollination of more than 50 crops, and by increasing their population, the beekeepers are keeping pace with increasingly diversified agriculture," he declared.
