Now that most farmers are about through harvesting their crops and have time to stop and think about their farming business once more, some might wonder how they could make a little more money off the farm. According to figures, the average farm in North Carolina has about 35 acres of woodland. Does this woodland on your farm make any money for you? Well, it should pay you from $10 to $15 per acre with proper management. This would give you $350 to $500 more income from your farm and not interfere in any way with your crops and livestock.

There are several things to be considered in managing a farm woodland properly. (1) The right type of species should be one of the first things to consider. White oak, poplar and walnut are good hardwood species, but require from good to a very fertile soil to make their best growth. Short leaf and white pine are good soft woods and make good growth on poorer soils. These should be considered for land not suitable for crops or pasture. If you have doubts as to what to plant, whether to interplant or whether to clear, cut, and replant, the extension forestry specialist will be glad to help you plan your woodland. (2) Thinning and removal of mature trees is another factor to consider in woodland management. When stands become 12 to 15 years old, especially set softwood stands, they begin to crowd each other, thus cutting down the growth rate. When thinning is done usually enough pulp wood is removed to pay for the thinning and at the same time you can utilize your labor to a good advantage.

In older stands, trees should be removed for saw timber when they become mature. Once a tree is mature it begins to decrease in value since disease and insects begin to work on the trees. Also removal of the older trees give the young timber a better chance. The state forester or extension forester will mark mature stands for no charge except the cost of paint. (3) Grazing and fire are two things which hurt woodland more than anything else. A cow will destroy young timber, including pines, and at the same time not be able to get enough food to keep her alive. This was proven at Co-weeta Experiment station where two cows could not survive in forty acres of woodland. Also, cattle pack the ground so that water does not penetrate it, thus causing much soil erosion on the fields below.

Fire in the woods burn the leaves and dead limbs which form a mulch on the ground, as well as severely damaging the trees. These are just a few of the things you can do during your spare time during the winter to make more money, better conserve your soil, and utilize your surplus labor if you have it available.

If you are interested in planting trees on non-cultivated land, they can be obtained through the county agent's office free of charge from TVA nurseries.

To transport the nation's output of coal from mine to market in 1951 required 8 1/2 million railroad carloadings, in addition to that moved by truck and barge.

On Some Important Issues

1. He is in favor of amending the farm-to-market Truck License Law to eliminate discrimination against Mountain Farmers.
2. He is in favor of repealing or amending the Law requiring Old-age Clients to give Mortgages on their Homes and small Farms to get assistance.
3. He is opposed to the political flim-flammy that goes on in Raleigh to keep the people from voting on the Liquor Question. The people of North Carolina have repeatedly been promised a state-wide referendum on liquor, and he believes that in a democracy they are ENTITLED to express their convictions on this important issue.
4. He believes in Western North Carolina. He believes in education. He is in favor of anything he thinks is for the development of this section, and he will support all measures that will tend to make a better state and a better Western North Carolina.
