Highlands Asks Well Bids To Relieve Water Shortage

The Highlands Board of Commissioners met September 6 with some of the leading businessmen to discuss the serious water shortage, with the result that the town is advertising for bids for the sinking of a new well.

With each summer, the water supply has become more of a pressing problem to the town. Last summer, two new wells were sunk — one a 600-footer, the other 625 — but they did not relieve the shortage as much as the state geologist had anticipated.

All of the men present at the meeting agreed the town needed to improve the water in both quantity and quality.

This latest well is the first step in their determination to correct the situation before the season next year. The bids call for a 250-foot eight-inch well.
