

N. C. Dairy Scientists Report On Cows' Eating

North Carolina State College dairy scientists have discovered that dairy cows will consume much larger quantities of hay than is generally believed and still support a high level of production. J. E. Legates, W. R. Murley, and R. K. Waugh, reporting on results of a research project before the American Dairy Science Association at a meeting held recently in Storrs, Conn., also reported that there are significant differences in the ability of cattle breeds to consume hay.

The researchers said the information yielded by their project will be used to try to increase forage-consumption traits in cattle.

Using 17 cows of the Ayrshire, Guernsey, Holstein, and Jersey breeds for their tests, the North Carolinians found that cows will not consume maximum amounts of hay during the first month to six weeks of lactation, but will reach a peak at eight to 10 weeks after freshening. This level of hay consumption is rather consistently maintained, even after production begins to decline.

Consumption of hay during the ninth to 12 week of lactation was used to characterize the intake of the cows.

Individual animals showed 100 per cent increases in hay intake, and the high cow reached a peak of 60 pounds of hay a day after consuming only 30 pounds during the first month on trial.

Consumption of hay was most closely associated with body weight, and was, essentially, independent of milk yield.

The cows were fed U. S. No. 2 alfalfa hay free choice, and a limited amount of grain.

Increased use of electricity on farms has led to lower average cost per kilowatt hour paid by farmers but somewhat higher monthly electric bills.
