Spruce Up Bedrooms

"Eight hours a day for life is a long time to spend in one place—yet most of us can expect to spend at least one-third of our lives in our bedrooms," says Miss Josephine Cusick, extension home development specialist at N. C. State College.

If you add to this the time you might spend in your room reading, writing, and relaxing, it's easy to see how well worth your while it is to make this room as completely liveable and inviting as all the other rooms in your home.

There was a time when bedrooms were uninviting by day and uncomfortable at night. Too often they served as a catch-all for odd pieces of furniture and had little in common with other rooms in the house. What a happy contrast is the bedroom of today with its comfort, convenience and beauty!

A bedroom is the one room in a home that can be made as individual as a signature. It can be an outlet for all the ideas and plans a person might have.

Careful planning is important if one is to have a sleeping unit to be proud of, Miss Cusick points out. The bed, of course, is the major item and should be placed for comfort and convenience. For ease in bedmaking, she suggests that you leave at least 18 inches of free space on either side of the bed.

A bedside table and a good reading light will add to the comfort and convenience, Miss Cusick adds. Small accessories like pillows, pictures, and a rug are not necessary, but they would add color and beauty and help complete its appearance.

"Remember that careful planning is much more important than spending a lot of money when it comes to making improvements in a bedroom," cautions Miss Cusick.

United States losses from plant pests, now over $3 billion annually, would be substantially greater without the protection of plant quarantine inspection, say entomologists with the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Commercial imports of plants are fairly easy to control, because most are certified pest-free by the country of origin. But the trained inspectors stationed at border, sea, and air ports examine commercial imports for assurance that there are not pests, contaminating soil, or prohibited packing material.
