Here's How To Get Larger Broiler Share

"There are two ways to get a larger share of the broiler market," according to Clayton P. Libeau, poultry and egg marketing specialist at North Carolina State College.

"One is to sell better broilers at lower cost and the other is to furnish the same product with better services than competing areas," he says.

Mr. Libeau points out that recent figures from official U. S. Department of Agriculture sources show the commercial broiler-feed ratio in North Carolina as 3.2. This means that one pound of live broiler will buy 3.2 pounds of feed. This is the lowest point reached in North Carolina, he adds, and lower than any other state in the nation. Mr. Libeau warns that if this condition should continue over a long period of time, it may discourage broiler production in North Carolina as compared to other states.

Two factors can change this situation of low broiler-feed ratio in North Carolina, he feels. One is higher broiler prices. He says one way to obtain higher prices is to produce a better product than competing areas so there will be a greater demand for quality products from North Carolina. But this is no easy solution, he adds, as long as the North Carolina product is no better than that other states can sell in the large metropolitan areas.

Another way to improve the broiler-feed ratio is through lower feed prices, according to Libeau. But he warns that the possibilities here are rather limited as most of the basic feed grains are under price supports. He feels that if

North Carolina feed manufacturers can find some feed ration that will give North Carolina producers a lower feed cost, then poultrymen could have a competitive advantage in production costs. Mr. Libeau maintains that this would help sell broilers for a price that was lower but still maintain broiler chickens in finished form with quality as good or better than competing areas.
