Sayin's

Howdy folks. Maybe you don't believe in groundhog day. Well, here I am—your old Country Groceryman again.

My business is selling groceries, but I do a lot of thinking about other things. Right now—the coming election up at the County seat has me worried. Mr. Welmar Jones is running for some office and others will be throwing their hats in the ring. I'll vote for one of them if (notice I say "if") he will promise me one thing — and stick to it. (Please read carefully).

I believe we need laws that help and protect people; that make our country a better place in which to live — laws that make people happy at home and at work; that bring about a better relationship; that alleviate the suffering of humanity. We want laws that we need.

I've been thinking of a law — if passed — would really be a blessing to humanity, and the only way we can get it passed is for all us men to stick together and vote for the man who will promise to do — and let him know that he will be tossed out on his head if he doesn't. Remember this — this law will help everyone of us men.

Every morning I get up and get ready to come to work. Before I go to the breakfast table I've dressed, washed, combed my hair, shaved, all spruced and span, floating in the aroma of shaving lotion — fit for a king. Then what? All of you married men can guess. I sit down and look across the table into the face of someone you do not know — (as such). You've never seen her half awake — had (?) dressed — without makeup — without her hair done up — without bulging portions squeezed in. (I had never seen her like that until we were married.) I'm sure you men know just what I mean.

Now, if we can only get some man who is running for office to promise us that he will pass a law that requires all women to look as well across the breakfast table as they do when they go out where others see them, I'm sure that we men will all vote for him. If you will stand by your old Country Groceryman we may get something done about it.

Come to see me sometime at the O'Le Country Grocery Store. (If not there, look in the doghouse).
