Reflections on meeting the Democratic Presidential Nominee

Last Tuesday in Washington, I heard Senator Sam Irwin, North Carolina's senior senator, give the following reasons as to why he would vote for and support John F. Kennedy for President of the United States. He cited the following, based on his knowledge of the man from working with him in committees in the Senate and in sponsoring legislation together.

Senator Irwin described Sen. Kennedy as one possessed with the finest mind and keenest intellect of anyone he had ever known.

He then described the presidential aspirant as being one who was completely honest both with himself and those he dealt with. Kennedy's loyalty to the Democratic party which went back several generations in his family was Senator Irwin's third reason for support. Hard working and industrious and his personal courage, as exemplified by his heroic conduct in World War II, were the final two reasons given by North Carolina's senior senator.

The introduction was made at a luncheon given in Washington by Senator Kennedy for representatives from North Carolina press, TV, and radio organizations. It was good, but not complete.

In addition to Senator Kennedy, vice-presidential candidate Lyndon B. Johnson and Democratic national chairman Harry Jackson were there.

In the address and question and answer period which followed, the keen mind which Senator Irwin had mentioned was very much in evidence. His answers were quick, forthright, and factual.

However, it was after the speaking was over when Sen. Kennedy was moving about the room conversing with one and all. Here he seemed very much the introvert, quiet, well-mannered, courteous, but friendly.

Time and time again through the period of more than one hour of socializing, as I watched this man who may be our next President, the thought came to my mind, "Well, here is a real southern gentleman of the old school — with a Harvard accent."

Keeping Chicks Healthy, Growing Is Vital Task

Keeping chicks healthy and growing is a vital task in order to have top performing pullets in the laying house.

"One thing that chicks will very likely encounter during the growing period is coccidiosis," says T. B. Morris, extension poultry specialist at N.C. State College.

A study at the college showed the time that chicks are more likely to have trouble with coccidiosis is between the fourth and twelfth weeks of age. Poultry raisers should pay special attention to their chicks during this age period.

Coccidiosis can affect not only the vitality and livability of the chicks but also the production ability of the pullets during the laying year. Treatment should be started as soon as possible after chicks are known to have coccidiosis.

A daily check on the chicks can pay dividends, in that mortality can be prevented and the chicks can be kept healthy.
