Hay caps are used primarily to protect partially cured hay from rain. During the process of curing hay throws off a large per cent of water. When it is put into the cock a heating or sweating process takes place. If the hay is wet by rain while in the cock it heats too rapidly and its feeding value is lessened or ruined. The use of hay caps on hay cocked at the right stage will prevent damage by rain.

A farmer living in the blue-grass section 10 miles south of Nashville, Tennessee, planted black locust sprouts on several acres of worn out hillside that was washing badly. In 20 years there were 300 trees per acre yielding 2,000 fence posts. A fair value in the standing tree was 15 cents per post, or a total value of $300 per acre. This is an average gross yield of $15 per acre yearly.

Similar growth and returns have been measured in the limestone valleys of West Virginia, while on the upland shale soils of the same state yields at 25 years equivalent to an average year return of $6 to $9 per acre have been found.
