The first $2,000,000 bank in the United States has just been organized through the combination of two of the larger financial institutions in New York.

This recalls to the mind of the writer that some thirty-five years ago numerous commercial and industrial institutions suddenly began to merge. The economy of operation thus achieved was immediately recognized and one consolidation followed another until the time became known as the "era of combination." In those days, of course, nobody knew how far this tendency to combine would go, but it now looks as though it had just got fairly started.

At first, such huge aggregations of capital was feared. The public worried over the terrific power coming into the hands of a few individuals, and a period of attempted "trust busting" followed. But time has slowly changed this feeling, and the people now realize that the saving accomplished by such consolidation is saved by the consumer as well as the producer.

And, furthermore, the publicity given by the press to all the acts of those in charge of "big business" is a powerful restraining influence. So, instead of creating suspicion and dread as it once did, the news of a new consolidation inspires confidence and respect, and we no longer fear the "trusts," secure in the realization that society will provide its own protection by demanding laws to curb any tendency toward the predatory use of accumulated capital, and certain that a reasonable share of resultant saving will be passed on to the general public.

Still They Come At Knollwood Heights

Mrs. Louise Hogg, who is enthusiastic over Knollwood Heights, has sold another lot, this one to Mrs. Florence DuBois of New York.

Mrs. DuBois authorizes Mrs. Hogg to make a selection, the stipulation being that it is "among the pine trees."

Knollwood Heights enters the spring with the utmost promise. Sales of home sites continue. Every house that has been completed has been occupied, and the fact that as many more are now scheduled for this summer as were built during the past season shows that the future is definitely guaranteed.

Pine Needles Inn had a good year.

It made many new friends and held its trade to the close. It will have a good season next winter. Its popularity increases the importance of Knollwood Heights.
