

Large Crowd Turns Out For Concert By Symphony Ensemble

Audience Very Responsive to the Program, Especially the Tschalkowsky Number

HOSPITAL AUXILIARY PLEASED

About 250 persons attended the concert by the Symphony Ensemble of the North Carolina Symphony Society at the Country Club last night. The large audience was very responsive especially to the Tschalkowsky number, "Andante Cantabile." This was played delicately and sincerely. The tone of the quartet was unusually good, and its technique, which was given a severe test in the Haydn quartet, also was exceptional.

So insistent was the audience in its appreciation that the Ensemble obliged with an encore number at the conclusion of the published program.

The program rendered follows:

I. Allegro Brillante, (Robert Schumann) (from Piano Quintet in E flat).

II. Quartet in D Major, (Joseph Haydn).

III. Five Petit Trios, (Cesar Gui), (flute, violin, piano).

IV. Andante Cantabile, (Tschalkowsky) (string quartet).

V. Two Pieces, (Lamar Stringfield), (a) A Moonshiner Laughs; (b) Cripple Creek, (string quartet.)

The ladies of the Moore County Hospital Auxiliary were much pleased with the response of the public and the help the money thus raised will give them in their work for the hospital. Definite announcement as to the amount realized from the affair will be published later.

An informal social hour was enjoyed following the conclusion of the program and during this time those present who so desired had opportunity to meet the members of the ensemble.

The Symphony Ensemble of the North Carolina Symphony Society comprises Lamar Stringfield, flutist; Katharine Defenbacher, violinist; George Herferman, violinist; Tony Hadgi, violist; Ralph Weatherford, cellist, and Adeline McCall, pianist.

Glenn Ford McKinney One of Pioneer Pennsylvania Oil Family

By Blon H. Butler
Life is a short span, with inconceivable achievement in the short period of man's individual existence. Sixty-five years ago I saw a boy in an oil country printing office in Pennsylvania. Eight or ten years previously Col. Drake had drilled a well on Oil Creek and found oil, and there began a great development that today extends around the globe and which has revolutionized world industry perhaps more than any other thing in a similar period. Oil for lamps was made from the product discovered, and whale oil and candles were given a back place. Today that industry gives the world a raw material that is worth far more than a billion dollars a year, and on which is founded other industries that make petroleum the basis for a big slice of our world prosperity and advancement.

A pioneer in the development of that industry was John L. McKinney, a young man from the upper Allegheny country who came to the oil field and with some other aggressive young fellows like John D. Rockefeller, established the big oil companies that brought this vast asset to the knowledge of the world and introduced the methods and the economies and the chemistry and the mechanics of making the petroleum products that have lifted the whole world to a new plane. John L. McKinney and John D. Rockefeller are today two old men, but perhaps no other two men have been more influential in brightening life on this globe. John L. McKinney, as life worked its way toward the autumn, made a home in Southern Pines, a castle on the Weymouth hilltop where the household spends the winters, and there the old timers delight to gather and recall the romance of the oil well development. A number of oil country people have gathered in the Sandhills, Ramage, Howlands, Barnsdall, Olmstead, younger men, some of them down to the second and third generations. Among these was Glenn Ford McKinney son of John L. McKinney, although the younger man had made a home on the Hudson in New York and turned his attention to other things than oil.

Student of Nature
Glenn Ford McKinney was attracted to the Sandhills by the outlying charm of the hills, the woods, the climate, and he established a country home out from Hoffman where he developed a country place that included a farm, a picturesque lake, a fascinating rural winter home, and undertook a scheme of improvement that made the McKinney estate one of the outstanding places of the Sandhills. Mr. McKinney was a student of Nature, and he cultivated the things that could thrive on his Sandhills property. His large development embellished the community in which he created it and made a nucleus about which began other improvement and beautification of the surrounding territory.

He was an excellent community asset. That oil country group was definitely democratic in its social and business relations. It was composed of men who learned from the start to be hustlers, and who from the crowding necessity of their marvelous development of great resources were compelled to broaden all form of industrial and scientific knowledge. The oil country fellows taught the world chemistry because their industry was strictly a chemical occupation and scheme. They had money to advance with, and they had the foresight and the courage. The McKinneys were leaders because they were in the field from the start.

The younger McKinney was 66 years old, young as we look back at the older day and compare him with

Community Gardens

They Produced Food Valued at More Than $12,000,000 During Year 1933

North Carolina's community gardens in 1933 produced foods the total value of which exceeded the entire amount of money expended for relief in the state during a similar period, reaching a total value of $12,250,000, the office of Mrs. Thomas O'Berry, State relief administrator, announces.

The cost of the community gardens producing this value in food crops was $487,653.75, these expenditures having been divided as follows: individual relief gardens, $163,891.96; individual relief farms, $19,012.18; community farm gardens, $144,418.26; relief school gardens, $2,761.96; canning costs, $157,570.13.

The food stuffs included fresh foods distributed to relief families during the growing season, and canned goods valued at millions of dollars, which are now being distributed. Mrs. O'Berry said. Because of the great success of these gardens, which have meant much to relief efforts in the state, the 1934 program will probably be carried out on an even more extensive scale, Mrs. O'Berry said.

the others who gave to the world the great gift of petroleum, yet almost claiming the three score and ten years allotted to man. Because he has dropped out at what seems a ripe age, although to the older ones appearing to be untimely as compared with those who survive, the tale that is told seems to encompass the achievement of life. Glenn Ford McKinney was a fine, active character in a full chapter of the world's work, and those who knew him realize that he leaves behind him an influence that is worth while.

But the retrospective glance at the life that has ceased seems like tearing the final pages from a book that has encompassed all there is of existence. For to one who remembers the McKinneys before the younger man was born, it seems as if "the sun went down at noon."
