Who's Who Among the Debaters Discussed by Walter Lippmann

By WALTER LIPPMANN

In view of the fact that the Supreme Court said in the N. R. A. decision that it could not draw in advance the precise line between Federal and state power, it is not astonishing that comment about the decision is very confusing. It has, in fact, produced some of the strongest paradoxes imaginable.

Thus the President, who has spoken as eloquently as any one on the dangers of centralized power, found himself out on the end of a limb, having given the country the impression that he would like to override the states. The Republican party which descends from Washington and Hamilton through Lincoln to Theodore Roosevelt began to talk as if it would like to return to the articles of Confederation which preceded the Constitution. Mr. Hoover, who described the attempt of the Federal government to stop a man from drinking a glass of beer as a noble experiment; Mr. Hoover, who from October, 1929, to March, 1933, extended the Federal power over banks, insurance companies, railroads, farms and factories beyond anything ever known in time of peace, suddenly emerged as an apostle of the purest Jeffersonian doctrine. Mr. Borah delivered an eloquent speech in praise of the Constitution and then inserted an amendment into the utility bill which was properly denounced as unconstitutional. Mr. Lowden, after an admirable speech on the dangers of centralization, sponsored a declaration in regard to agriculture which, if it means anything, means that the agricultural problem is to be handled by the central government.

As one of those who do not feel they have the final and complete answer to the question, I have been trying in my mind to define the issue. I have not got very far. As a mere beginning I have been trying to classify the various points of view which seem to be represented in the debate. The result is crude and probably not very important, but here it is.

1. Those who believe that when the Supreme Court interprets the Constitution, it has no choice as to how it will interpret it. They would hold, for example, that the clause in the Constitution dealing with commerce is just as clearly controlling over the opinion of the Court as, let us say, the provision that the term of the President shall be four years.

2. Those who believe that in interpreting some sections of the Constitution, particularly that dealing with commerce, the Court has discretion and adapts the Constitution in the light not merely of precedent but of its views of public policy.

3. Those who hold that the Federal government has no power not expressly granted to it.

4. Those who hold that it has large reserve and implied powers.

These are the four main general attitudes as to how the Constitution should be interpreted. They have existed since the earliest days.

It is useful then to note certain conflicting beliefs about the kind of government we ought to have. The conflict has existed at all times in American history.

and price-fixing. They are moving toward a state capitalism which would eventually be indistinguishable from state socialism. Their program would require a radical change in the Constitution.

9. Those who believe that laissez-faire and state socialism are both dangerous and impracticable. They believe that during the depression it has been demonstrated all over the world that by means of a coherent monetary, budgetary and tariff policy, the economic system can be kept in a working balance without resort to the regimentation of private enterprise. They believe that without such a policy private capitalism will break down and that the regimentation and the socialism which supplant it will then break down too. Their view is exemplified by the policy of countries like Great Britain, Sweden, Australia, Belgium. It is part of the policy of the New Deal, unhappily confused and neutralized by the policy of regimentation. Personally, it seems to me the most promising. It requires no change in the Constitution. The necessary powers have existed in the Constitution from the very beginning.

There are two other points of view which, though not inherently important, are important politically.

10. There are those who believe that centralization is proper if the centralized power is in Republican hands.

11. There are those who believe it is proper if the power is in Democratic hands.

In 1932, for example, Mr. Roosevelt was shocked by Mr. Hoover's immense deficit expenditures. In 1935 Mr. Hoover is shocked by Mr. Roosevelt's immense deficit expenditures.

In actual life these eleven points of view may be found in many different combinations. That is what makes the current debate so confusing. (Copyright, 1935, for The Pilot)

MOTHER AND CHILD BITTEN BY DOG AT GLENDON

Dr. Symington has procured anti-rabies treatments for a Mrs. Phillips and her daughter of Glendon, who were bitten by a dog on Friday. Mrs. Phillips is said to have been bitten while attempting to keep the dog away from her children. Two others from the upper part of the county are said to have been attacked by a dog, but it has not been learned whether the dog was afflicted with rabies.
