

Carthage Jr. Chamber Observes 1st Birthday

Holds Banquet and Dance To Celebrate Successful Year's Work

The Carthage Junior Chamber of Commerce entertained at a banquet on Monday evening at the Lang House, celebrating its first birthday. Jacob Hurwitz, outgoing president, gave a resume of the projects undertaken and completed during the year by the Jaycees. Following this, he presented Miss Betty Jane Seawell, who was sponsored by the Junior Chamber of Commerce and elected queen at the recent Sanford Tobacco Festival.

Charles Turner, president-elect, outlined briefly the program for the coming year and introduced other incoming officers: Clement Barrett, 1st vice-president; Marshall Ginsburg, 2nd vice-president; A. D. Way, Jr., secretary; Hoyle Sullivan, treasurer; John Katsos, sergeant-at-arms.

A beautifully decorated birthday cake, bearing one lighted candle centered the central table. Attractive favors were given. Following the banquet dancing was enjoyed by the members and their guests. Those attending the banquet were A. D. Way, Jr. with Miss Barbara Frye, Robert Hyman with Miss Lucile Harrington, John Katsos with Miss Floy Mae Thomas, L. L. #### Many Are The Reasons Why It Deserves The Support of The Public

BY KAY MARTIN, Librarian

At this time, when the Library Association is in the middle of its membership drive, it is well for us to consider once again what the library means to the community. The Southern Pines Library needs support badly now, and it should be a matter of civic pride with the townspeople, to give this much-deserved support.

Thomas Carlyle called the public library "a people's university." (Although we are not public we fulfill all the public library requirements except the maintenance and means of support.) This phase, of course, has reference to the book stock. There are very few libraries which have all the books they need and want, and our library is no exception. We are constantly in need of new adult books and children's books. On the other hand, we have an excellent reference collection, a larger book stock than most libraries of the same size, and usually end the season with at least one copy of the best-sellers.

Carlyle's synonym for libraries brings out the idea of learning and securing information from books. Last year we did a great deal of work with the school children and we are looking forward to helping them more this year. Of course, we also stand ready to answer the questions of adults and to find information for them.

But libraries have another function—that of furnishing pleasure and enjoyment. Most of our circulation comes from books that accomplish this purpose. About $25.00 worth of new books are bought every month from September to May. In addition to these, our stack room contains about 4,500 books of fiction. In this collection many hours of pleasure can be found.

And let us consider what the library means to children. Adults often say they are too busy to read. Grown people know what they do and do not need and if they find no place for books in their lives, the point can not be argued. But with children it is a different story. They need books to help them grow, to help them study, to help them become good citizens, to help them develop character, to help them play. That they are eager for books was illustrated by the hearty response we had to the Vacation Reading Club this summer. For all these reasons we dare to say that the children's department in a library is the most important of all.

If you enjoy reading you need have no reasons presented to you for supporting the library; if you have children you should support it for their sakes if for no other; if you are a person who never finds time to read, support your library for the pleasure and enjoyment it gives to those who do.
