MONUMENT UNVEILED AT BLUE CLAN REUNION

Highlands, welcomed such cousins as were in need of being made to feel at home. They sang "Faith of Our Fathers" and the Rev. M. D. McNeill, whose mother was a Blue, pronounced the benediction,

As for the stone itself, it is a natural monument, such as is sometimes found in these parts, as if it had been tossed down for just such a purpose by some meteor of some comet. The bronze tablet bears the names of Duncan and Margaret, the years of their living and "American citizens by choice.'

After the tremendous dinner, the Blues organized themselves and planned next year's meeting. Sheriff Blue was named president, Neill Blue of Carthage, vice-president, and Miss Pauline Blue, secretary and treasurer. Clifton Blue, who got himself into the newspaper business, was named chairman of a committee on memorials. There are a lot of other ancestors and Sheriff Blue knows where he can find some more stones like the one that was set up over the graves of the ancestors of the Moore county Blues. Casual friends of the clan, who got into the meeting by invitation, were disposed to marvel a little at the extreme modesty of the ceremonials. There was no glorification of the family, though they could have named an admiral or two, some scattered statesmen, lawyers, engineers and the like. They could have said, even, that in all the annals of the family, not one of them had been hanged. But they let it go at its simplest: here is where the Blues began.
