Book Review

By MRS. E. V. HUGHES

"From The Land of Silent People," by Robert St. John, surpasses most heroic fictional adventures at stimulating spirited aspirations in readers, envious of news reporters, who risk their lives and above all their cameras and their typewriters to bring us first-hand information on what war is in "hopeless, scared, soul-seared" countries, where human suffering is at its worst. St. John's mental camera caught a picture of crippled, disillusioned people struggling amid smells that nauseated, noises that screamed and a silence like eternity. He warns us that he is just giving us a newspaper man's version of Yugoslavia and Greece. He has not fitted it together or given it meaning; that he leaves to propagandists. It has made no sense to him; if it does to us all well and good.

The defeat of Yugoslavia was notable, however, because of the "Diaper Revolution," the rebellion of children, acting on what they had heard their parents say; children, who threw out the government which had sold them to Hitler and returned the child, Peter, to the throne amid frenzied demonstrations, while a mysterious Greek diplomatic agent encouraged them with hints of British and Greek troops with equipment to back them up. A painfully pathetic picture of a tragic carnival of people beaten before they started! For, when Ribbentrop spoke on bloody Sunday and the dive bombers came over Belgrade to fight men with muskets it became a city of lost souls.

Newspaper men, including St. John, who had been threatened with expulsion for taking a picture, watched each other furtively to prevent one from stealing a march on the others; struggled to free themselves from propaganda; battled their way through crowds; protected each other with every trick known to man, while they hoped for breaks and suspected that their ghastly information was not reaching the outside world. The word "America" had always meant something; now it meant nothing. Their stories included an eye opening report of German staged propaganda used against the nation they had just brought to its knees, which is told with bitter irony. St. John calls that last week in Yugoslavia "a saga of World War II." "Christ," he whispered both religiously and profanely, recalling Amy Lowell's poem, "Christ! What are patterns for?"

St. John follows with an account of a perilous trip across the Ionian Sea to Corfu in a one-cylinder affair that sounded like a machine gun in action. He describes the peacefulness of the town and the people, who had been to America and hoped to return some day. In a few hours "fright and hell" moved in to Corfu and followed or preceded them down the coast, forcing them many times to use their heads instead of the ethical integrity they had learned in a civilized world. Sometimes they went mad at what they saw and heard and smelled—at the sight of supplies destroyed in the face of starvation to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. These stories could not be sent but they would be good anytime.

No American should neglect to read this account of their return to Cairo, the inside story of the defense of Greece, the activities of fifth columnists, the evacuation of Argos, even worse than that of Dunkirk; stories St. John could not tell when he returned to the United States, where toastmasters warned him not to say anything after dinner that would disturb the digestion of his audience.
