Re-Created Cherokee Indian Village
Depicts American Wilderness Life

Formal Opening Of Project At Cherokee
Was Held Wednesday

By JOHN PARRIS

A re-created 200-year-old Cherokee Indian village was opened officially at Cherokee Wednesday, August 27, so posterity can see what life was like before the white man tamed the American wilderness.

The village, which is inhabited by descendants of the aborigines, is located on a site near Mountain-side theatre where nomadic Indians camped 6,000 years ago.

It is to be known as Oconaluftee Indian Village, named for an ancient Cherokee town that existed four miles west of here at the present site of Birdtown.

The project was conceived by the Cherokee Historical association as part of an ever-expanding program to perpetuate the history and traditions of the Cherokee Indians of the Great Smokies.

A preview tour of the village was given Tuesday, August 26, from 1 p.m. until 5 p.m. for members of Western North Carolina Associated communities and Western North Carolina Tourist association.

The village will be open daily and Sunday through October from 1 o'clock until 5 o'clock. Beginning in 1953 it will operate from May through October.

Unique in conception, the village is a "living museum" where Cherokee Indian men, women, and children turn back the clock 200 years. There, wearing authentic Cherokee dress of the 1750 period, they daily carry out an ancient way of life, displaying arts in basketry, pottery, and weapon-making that are almost lost.

The village contains five structures of authentic ancient design and an open air temple where tribal rituals were held. Ringing the compound is a palisade of more than 2,000 locust poles.

These structures include three types of homes in which the Cherokee lived. The oldest reproduction is one in which the walls are woven river cane over which a plaster of river clay was applied.

Other structures were erected with logs—one notched, the other hewn; both chinked with clay. None of the structures have windows. The floors are earthen.

Largest of the buildings is the council house, the men's ceremonial and political structure. It was here that Cherokee warfare and ball play were planned, an area generally closed to women. In fact, it was a man's refuge.

It was here the Cherokee made all of their tribal decisions, where the wise old men of the tribe passed on to the younger members of the tribe the lore and traditions of their race.

The council house is seven-sided. In the center is a fireplace, used both for light and cooking. Here, too, was kept the Sacred Fire of the Cherokee—an eternal flame that was never permitted to burn out.

On the benches and around the walls in the council house are many of the things that pertain only to men's ritual activities and men's pastimes. Here hang the bows and arrows and guns, the handcarved wood masks used in the Booger and Eagle dances. Here also, are the Eagle Dance wands—the precious eagle tails used in the Calumet rituals—and the gourd rattlers used with them in the Eagle Dance which was so important in treaty making and alliances.

Conspicuous in the council house are the herbs used by men, hung here in fairly large quantities. Some of them are the ball player's medicine. Others are the herb medicines—the leaves of which were brewed every morning by the men and drunk as a sort of tea in the town.

The fireplace in the center of the council house represents the central fireplace of the town. This is the fireplace in which the ritual new fire was kindled at the New Year ceremonies and from which the fire was carried to all the other hearths in the town.

Some craft activities, such as making ball sticks, were carried on in the council house in rainy weather.

There are rows of benches and beds around the walls of the council house. The beds are covered with deerskins and other bedding materials, particularly fern.

Outside the compound Indian men and women can be seen at work making pottery, baskets, bows and arrows, blowguns, and dugout canoes.

Here in the village is the only place in the world where visitors will be able to see the weaving of old Cherokee baskets, such as the pack basket which was used to carry corn and grain.

John Withoft, state anthropologist of the Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission, who is directing the village project, said discovery that some of the ancient arts still exist here in the mountains is one of the most important finds any place.

Withoft is recognized as one of America's foremost authorities on American Indians, particularly the Indians of the Southeast. He is probably the best authority living on the Cherokee, having spent previous years here working with many of the old Indians.

"The surviving folk culture of the Reservation," he said, "is much more important than the reconstruction of the ancient structures."

He declared that "this is a unique village—nothing like it in the world, because here you have descendants of an ancient people who fortunately have not forgotten all their ancient lore and history."

"Our job," Withoft said, "is to see that these ancient techniques, such as in basketry and wood-carving, continue to survive."

Costumes for the villagers were designed by Mrs. Suzanne Davis, costumer for "Unto These Hills," the Cherokee Indian drama. Long considered one of the nation's outstanding authorities on Cherokee dress, Mrs. Davis based her costumes on years of research.

The Village project is under the supervision of the Tsali Institute for Cherokee Indian Research, established by the Cherokee Historical Association with the cooperation of the universities of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia.

Harry Davis, director of "Unto These Hills," trained the Indian guides who direct visitors through the Village.
