

Rotary Club Told Of City Manager Role In Community

City managers, a comparatively new breed of professional in this country, can tell a town by the elected officials it has, members of the Rotary Club were told Friday.

William Gary Head, new assistant town manager in Southern Pines, said that it is often possible to tell whether or not a town is split by determining whether the council is split; "for someone who is working for elected officials, such a determination is important."

Head, assistant town manager, came here last month as a replacement to Louis Scheipers, Jr., who was elevated to Town Manager succeeding Tom Cunningham. A graduate of the public administration school at the University of Oklahoma, he has quickly ingratiated himself with the community.

The city manager form of government is a comparatively new thing, he told the Rotarians, having seen its greatest growth since 1946. Today, men who go into it as a profession usually must earn a bachelor's and a master's degree from a recognized university and specialize in public administration either on a federal, state or local level.

After graduation, the first year is usually spent in internship, the same course that most professions now take. That, to a great extent, is his job here, he told the Rotarians.

The meeting attracted an unusually large number of guests.

Present were Ed Martin of Boston, brother of the former speaker of the House Joe Martin; Jerry Lynch, Jamestown, N.Y.; Leo J. Lynch, Mariden, Wisconsin; George Casey, Jim Dalrymple and Ted Haigler, Sanford; Bob Armstrong, Providence, R.I.; Orrin Carhart, Rochester, N.Y.; and Ted Rypens, Greensboro.

In 1955-56 there were 417 billion cigarettes manufactured in the U.S.
