ELECTORS VOTE DECEMBER 19

How Electoral College Works

Requests have been made to The Pilot to explain how the Electoral College works. Briefly, this is the story:

The American citizen does not vote for the candidate but for a group of state representatives (electors) who are pledged to vote for a particular candidate. For this reason, a President, although a winner by popular vote, is not "officially elected" until the electors meet and cast their ballots. Each state has as many electors as it has United States Senators and members of the House of Representatives, including 3 electoral votes each for Alaska and Hawaii, there are a total of 537 Electoral Votes, 269 of which are needed to win.

The electors of each state vote in conformity with the dictate of a plurality of their states citizens only. Whether a candidate carries a state by one or one million, he gets all of the state's electoral votes. This enables a President to be elected with a minority of the total popular national vote. This has happened three times—in 1824, 1828 and in 1888.

On the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December (December 19, this year), the electors vote in their respective state capitols. The votes of the electors, certified by the states, are sent to Congress where the President of the Senate opens the Certificates and has them counted in the presence of both Houses on January 8, following a presidential election. The Presidents term of office ends and the President-elect's term begins at noon on January 20.

North Carolina has 14 electoral votes. In 1956 they were cast for Adlai Stevenson and Estes Kefauver who received 590,530 votes in North Carolina, while Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard M. Nixon, Republicans, received 575,062.
