Mr. Goings' wife and two children, who attend school in the Sandhills, have been here since August. The Goings have a new home off the highway and a new shop and display room is being built near the home, with completion expected within two weeks. W. O. Moss Sells Woodland Tract To Hunting People

A land sale of particular interest to hunting people is that of a tract sold by W. O. Moss to Mr. and Mrs. William Goff of Wayne, Pa. The tract is extensive, 54 acres in all, and is part of the former Notre Dame Academy property. It is adjacent to that bought last year by Mr. and Mrs. Douglas. The land is extensively wooded and the stream which fills the Douglas lake also flows through the Goff property. It is the plan of the new landholders also to make a small lake, and work has already been started clearing the land and getting ready to build the dam. The Goffs expect to get the place in order and start building their stable in the near future, with house plans still in the offing. Mr. and Mrs. Goff come from a hunting country and have been hunting with the Moore County Hounds here for the past two winters.

Wildlife Protectors Use Bloodhounds To Enforce Laws, Find Lost Hunters

Bloodhounds on North Carolina's wildlife refuges have been used for such varied tasks as tracking down escaped convicts and finding lost hikers, according to an article appearing in the November issue of "Wildlife in North Carolina." John Oberheu, a wildlife refuge supervisor for the N. C. Wildlife Resources Commission, reveals the keenness of the hound's importance in wildlife law enforcement in the commission's monthly magazine. Oberheu, who lives in Asheville, relates the story of Susie, a bloodhound who trailed a suspected angler back to where he had hidden 53 trout in a ditch. Daily limit is 10, and the fisherman was convicted of exceeding the creel limit because of Susie's canine detective ability. The refuge supervisor writes that the bloodhound is the only dog whose testimony is accepted in court. Bloodhounds originated in England, he says, but were developed to greatest usefulness in the United States. The commission's bloodhounds are used for more than law enforcement. An elderly hiker, lost from his car for more than half a day, was found at midnight more than nine miles from his starting point. A car window had been broken to give the dog a good scent, after worried relatives contacted a nearby protector. On other occasions Wildlife Commission personnel and their dogs have assisted in capturing bank robbers and other criminals. Some of the dogs are owned jointly by the Wildlife Commission and local law enforcement agencies. Oberheu says that the bloodhounds are harmless and friendly unless their quarry attempts to flee, but then they'll run down and attack a person if necessary to hold him.
