Jobless
Program
Beneficial

North Carolina ranks eighth in the nation in the number of hard-core unemployed who have been hired under a special elective income tax credit program which is scheduled to end Dec. 31, 1981.

The special program, the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit (TJTC) program, was enacted in 1978 by Congress as a means to increase employment in the private sector, particularly for the disadvantaged. The Reagan Administration is urging Congress not to extend the program past its current expiration date of Dec. 31.

Between June, 1979, when TJTC was implemented and the end of the first quarter of 1981, 20,229 Tar Heels, who are often considered the "unemployables," had been employed under the tax credit program. It is estimated by the state Employment Security Commission (ESC), which administers the program, that 34,229 jobless people will have been hired under TJTC by the end of the year.

The targeted unemployed groups the program is designed to help include economically disadvantaged youths, Vietnam veterans, and ex-convicts; recipients of Supplemental Security Income and general welfare assistance; handicapped individuals in vocational rehabilitation programs; and youths aged 16 to 19 participating in cooperative education programs.

The TJTC, which may be taken in each of the initial two years of the worker's employment, is 50 percent of first-year wages up to $6,000 ($3,000) and 25 percent of second-year wages up to $6,000 ($1,500).

The Reagan Administration contends that TJTC has not opened up a significant number of new job opportunities in the private sector for individuals from the seven target groups.

But ESC Chairman J.B. Archer says the tax credit program has given thousands of persons, otherwise, who would not have been hired, a fair shake at the job market.

"Our employees are saying that TJTC is opening doors with employers that have never been opened before," Archer said.

"When we had 187,700 people unemployed in the state in March and we expect that number to grow during the coming months, we are going to need to offer our unemployed as many new job opportunities in the private sector as possible," Archer said. "I believe TJTC has been a very successful incentive to private employers in North Carolina to hire persons from these target groups and I hope that Congress will extend the tax credit program next year."

Dental Care
Said Bargain

How much are we paying the dentist?

A lot, some Americans would say. Two recently released government studies show that it's a bargain compared with visiting a physician or going to a hospital.

The Health Care Financing Administration of the Health and Human Services Department reports that the average American spends $60 a year for dental care. By contrast, his tab for hospital care is $379 and $180 goes for physician's services.

That's the average for everyone. About 53 percent of the work force actually goes to the dentist in a year's time, according to the National Center for Health Statistics. Most of us visit the dentist twice a year, with professional and technical workers going slightly more often. Even the unemployed go for 1.8 dental checkups a year.

Persons with incomes over $10,000 tend to spend more out of pocket for dental care. About one dollar in four for dental care is paid by insurance or other types of coverage.

Orthodontic insurance is one of the nation's best health care buys, according to Dr. Russell K. Street, an Anderson, S.C. dental specialist, who presided over the annual meeting here of the Southern Carolina Orthodontic Association.
