Origin of Hogs.

Our common American breeds of hogs are a combination of what is best in two distinct types. One is the wild hog of the forests of Europe and the other is the Chinese hog. The wild hog of Europe has a very large head and a long snout. It is a long-legged, high-backed animal with the ability to run nearly as fast as a horse. For a thousand years the royalty of Europe have found it great sport to hunt the wild boar. He is very fierce, and uses his sharp tusks to good advantage in fighting off the dogs. To this day there are wild hogs in Europe, and many of the farm types of hogs in Russia, Poland and the Balkan states are only slightly changed from the original wild type.

The Chinese hog is an altogether different kind of animal. For more than four thousand years the Chinese have been selecting for a hog which would fatten quickly, a hog with a high percentage of meat and fat and a small percentage of bone and waste material. Several hundred years ago the Chinese seemed to have fixed a short-legged, fat-hammed, small-boned type of hog. They had small heads, pendulous bellies, and were rather weak in the back.

All of our modern breeds are a combination of the wild hog of Europe with the Chinese hog. The name, "Poland China," for instance, indicates the Chinese blood in our most popular black breed of hogs. It is a matter of history that back about 1816 some typical white Chinese hogs with fine bone, short legs, small heads, and early fattening qualities, were crossed with a larger, coarser type of hog with a big head, long legs and large bone. The Berkshire was also used in forming the Poland China and it is from the Berkshire that the black color comes. When we go back into the history of the Berkshire, we find that it also was formed by combining the Chinese hog with the wild hog type. More than a hundred years ago, in central England, a reddish-brown hog, evidently derived from the original wild type, was crossed with the Chinese hog. These particular Chinese hogs were black in color and had prick ears, both of which characteristics they stamped upon the Berkshire.

The history of the Duroc is not quite so clear-cut as that of the Poland China. The Duroc seems to have come originally from the west coast of Africa, Spain and Portugal. As to whether or not these red hogs of Spain, Portugal and Africa trace back to the wild hog of Europe or to the Chinese hog can not be stated for certain. The chances are, however, that there was a very strong dash of Chinese blood in all of these red hogs before they ever came to the United States.

The Yorkshire and Tamworth give less evidence of Chinese blood than any other of our common breeds of hogs. Both of these breeds have rather long legs and the Tamworth particularly has a large head somewhat after the type of the wild hog of Europe. Both of them have strong constitutions and are good travelers.

During the past ten years there has been a strong tendency in the Durocs and Polands to emphasize the big type idea. By this is meant emphasizing the large bone, the long legs, the strong back and good constitution which came originally from the wild hog of Europe. An effort has been made also to hold on to the early maturing and easy fattening qualities of the Chinese hogs.

In nearly all breeding work, whether it be with plants or animals, the greatest progress has generally been made by the mixture of two strains and then endeavoring to fix the type so as to combine the best points of the two strains. Hog breeders have shown especially great skill during the past hundred years in combining the good points of the Chinese hog with the good points of the wild hog of Europe.—Wallace's Farmer.
