FARM ECONOMY

There are so many phases of farm economy that it would be impossible to call attention to all of them, or even any considerable number of them, in one article. Therefore we are just going to mention one particular thing which came under our actual observation a little while ago.

We were trying to impress upon three farmers the importance of lowering the cost of crop production. One of them rather vigorously replied that he had gone over every item in the cost of production and had reached the very bottom. We proceeded to walk and talk for about one hundred yards when we came to one of his fields. The first things that attracted attention were two three-horse plows which had been lying in the corner of the fence for two months in the rain and sunshine. On the other side of the fence, almost opposite, was a hay rake and mower which had been standing in the sunshine and rain for three weeks.

This farmer was asked if he really had considered everything in lowering the cost of producing his crops. The farm implements in sight represented an outlay of practically $200, and the damage which had been done to them, and which would have been saved at practically no cost, must have been close to ten percent of the value.

The question is, had this farmer considered everything in lowering the cost of producing his crops? We say he had not, and just the conditions we found on that farm are prevailing on many thousands of farms in this country.—The Southern Planter.
