Long, long ago, "lunch" was something in a box or basket to eat and not an excuse to kill two hours.

LIME IN THE SOIL IS ESSENTIAL TO LEGUMES

Raleigh, Nov. 1.—"We think we know a lot, but we still do not know so very much about the mysteries of plant life and the soil," said an agricultural research worker at State College recently in discussing the importance of limestone with certain crops.

"For instance, we know that tobacco takes about the same amount of lime from the soil that a ton of alfalfa does, yet we have only recently begun to use magnesium limestone under our tobacco. No wonder we began to have sand-drown so badly in our fields. We know that alfalfa will not grow well on land in need of lime. Each ton of the crop contains about 80 pounds of lime and thus makes a heavy draft on the supply in the soil."

Agricultural extension workers have realized the importance of growing winter legume crops this year. There is a great need for more food and feed crops and the workers realize that if enough winter grain and legumes for hay and feed are planted this fall, the feed bill for next spring and summer will be materially cut. These same workers realize, however, that it is useless to plant great acreages of legumes on land that will not grow them successfully and they have conducted an intensive campaign for soil improvement through the use of lime and legumes in combination. Several of the county agents report an increased use of limestone over most of the state this fall. Many of the car shipments have been ordered cooperatively so that the small grower could secure enough for his needs at a cost within his reach.

It is pointed out that one reason why lime is needed under legumes is because the nitrogen fixing bacteria will not grow in a sour soil. If the legumes do not add nitrogen to the soil, they do not improve it. Lime is necessary therefore to the continued improvement of the land by the growing of legumes.
