It Is Not Only Advisable For Married Folks to Shure Their Joys Unselfishly, but the Wise Husband and Wife Will Be Equally Generous In the Exchange of Worriss.

[Copyright, 1966, by C. S. Yost.] TY DEAR JOHN-I think you are making a grave mistake. I have been in the same boat and understand your motives. They are laudable and right as motives, but they go wrong in action. They don't accomplish what you expect of them. Did you ever see a cross eyed calf? I never saw but one, and I was the proud possessor of that one when I was a kid. That calf never did learn to get a proper focus on things (it joined the beef trust before it was a yearling), and its fool antics used to make me laugh till I got the stomach ache. I remember once upon a time Lightning. as I used to call it, because you never could tell where it was going to strike,

I recall this incident simply to illustrate the point I made in the beginning that good motives don't always pan out good results. That calf aimed right and was doing its level best to go right. There are a lot of people just like my toytime pet, except that their strabismus is mental and not necessarily permanent. Now you come to me with your little troubles, which you think are big ones, and say you don't want your wife to know anything about them because you don't
