A VIRGINIA EPISODE.

By HARRIET CAMBEY. (Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.)

During that period when the armies of the Confederacy and of the north were swaying back and forth in Virginia, while in command of the 4th New York volunteer infantry, I was advanced one evening into territory that had been previously held by the enemy. Near me was a house, and from the inmates I received an invitation to supper. I accepted and found a lady and her daughter, the rest of the family, consisting of two sons, being in the Confederate army. I will call them Mrs. and Miss Bates. Considering that the blockade had deprived them of all table supplies except such as could be raised in the south, they gave me a very fair meal made up of the only chicken left by the "Johnnies" and the delicious hot bread that southern women know so well how to make.

I was then twenty-eight years old and considered myself passably attractive to women. There can be no modesty in my now saying so, since the wrinkled, white headed old man of today is not the same bodily person as the young soldier of 1863. I had seen those southern girls fall precipitately in love on sight with our Yankee boys and was not especially taken aback when Clara Bates showed a sudden admiration for me.

The young lady confined the expression of her attraction for me to her eyes and her speech. She would no permit me even to touch her hand. She seemed troubled at the proximity of two hostile armies, declaring that though her sympathies were with the Confederates, she hoped they would retreat farther south. I set myself to work to draw from her any information she might possess of the enemy's intentions, and she told me that a southern general whom she spoke of familiarly as Bob and who had left her only that morning had expressed an opinion that it would be some time before he would see her again. Considering this to indicate a further retreat, I was about to take my leave for the purpose of reporting it at once to my general when I heard from the next room the words, spoken in Mrs. Bates' own voice: "Kiss me again, Bob."

Darting a glance at my companion I saw the blood rushing into her face. Then she started up to leave the room; but, grasping her wrist, I detained her. Immediately from the same room as before came a succession of snatches: Miss Bates made another effort to free herself, but I laughingly held her, saying:

"This is far too interesting to lose. Please sit still."

"Clara! Sweetheart!" came another voice, this time a man's, but sounding rather as if it issued from a phonograph than a human being, followed by a lot of unintelligible croaking.

Miss Bates writhed, but by this time I had both her wrists in my grasp and she could not get away. I tender her for perhaps five minutes, waiting for something more from the adjoining room. Presently it came in a masculine voice:

"All together! Surprise 'em! Two o'clock!"

At this the heightened color left my prisoner's face, and she turned pale. I would not now let her go on any account. It must have been five minutes before more came. Then it was: "Goodby, sweetheart! Goodby! Goodby!"

There was a long wait after this and I was beginning to fear there would be no more when I received another installment, still in the masculine line:

Releasing my prisoner, I left her with a derisive "Goodby, Clara," and directing that a guard be immediately thrown around the house that there might be no communication from it with the enemy, I rode at once to the corps commander.

"General," I said, "I have just passed through an experience which I interpret as follows: I have been entertained by a southern girl who purposely gave me false information that the enemy in our front would again retreat. There I learned, doubtless from a parrot in an adjoining room, which had been used either for a council of war or from which orders were issued, that we will be attacked before daylight in the morning; though what morning I can't inform you. Tomorrow seems most likely."

"Thanks, colonel," replied the general. "We'll take the precaution to be under arms every morning."

It was half past 2 the very next morning that an attack was made on our right, re-enforced by artillery, followed by infantry, all along the line. But as soon as the enemy saw that we were under arms and ready for them they ceased firing and gradually withdrew. We followed and gained a substantial advantage.

THINK IT OVER

Would the ablest business men in the country have a bank account if there was no advantage or convenience in it? Would they have been able to reach their present commanding position if they had spent half their time worrying about the safety of the money they had made?

THIS BANK invites you to open an account as they did. The same advantages they found in so doing will accrue to you if you accept the invitation.
