But of most value in the great movement against tuberculosis has been the organized association or committee, whose business it has been to see that tuberculosis was prevented in every community. Of course they haven't done it yet, but the value of an organized, systematic campaign against tuberculosis is attested by the great reductions in the death rates from this disease in such cities as New York, Boston and Baltimore, where active campaigns have been carried on for years. The anti-tuberculosis association is the centre from which have radiated the movements for sanatoria, hospitals, dispensaries, nurses and all other equipment of the great national movement
