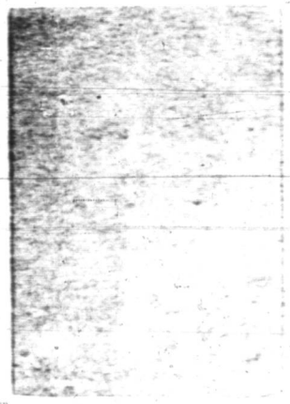
GOV. MORRISON NAMES MAY 1 "BUNDLE DAY"

Chief Executive Appeals To North Carolinians To Send Discarded Winter Clothing to Near East Relief, in Official Proclamation.

May 1st has been declared "Bundle Day" in North Carolina, and the people of the Tarheel State are asked to send all their cast-off winter clothing to the Near East Relief, in a proclamation issued Monday by Governor Cameron Morrison.

Dr. E. C. Brooks, State Superintendent of Public Instruction in State ...



... Clothing should be sent to the local Near East Relief chairman, or to the Near East Relief Clothing Warehouse in Raleigh. Parcel post shipments in sacks is preferred, but clothing can be shipped by freight if most convenient to the shipper.

Governor Morrison's proclamation read:

"Whereas, it has been established that the suffering of the Armenians and other Christian peoples of the Near East is from reasons beyond their control, and that they are unable to rehabilitate themselves for this same reason; and

"Whereas, it is reported by reliable Americans that, aside from the old clothing which America sends them, these people have nothing but burlap bags and flour sacks to keep out the cold of winter, their climate being similar to that of our New England States; and

"Whereas, unless sufficient clothing is sent from America this summer, many thousands will freeze to death next winter; and

"Whereas, the Near East Relief, Inc., Southern Division, Near East Relief, has set 150,000 pounds of warm, usable, cast-off clothing which, it is estimated, will save 50,000 humans from death by freezing next winter as its goal;

"Therefore, I, Cameron A. Morrison, Governor of North Carolina, do hereby declare May 1, 1923, 'Bundle Day,' and request the people of our State to gather all of such discarded winter clothing and ... over to their county Near East Relief chairman or other agency which is collecting clothing for the Near East Relief, or send it to the Near East Relief Clothing Warehouse in Raleigh, where it will be put with all possible dispatch in the hands of the suffering peoples across the seas."

METAL HAS CALL FOR CHIC GOWNS

Silver and Gold Trimmings Are in the Fashion Picture for Spring.

FABRIC WILL HOLD GLITTER

Threads in Better Material Should Not Tarnish—Metalized Stuffs, if of Good Quality, Will Defy Long Wear.

The charms of silver and gold as applied to dress show no signs of abatement, according to a fashion writer in the New York Times. At first we took the application of metal to our gowns with more or less amusement and not the least show of seriousness. We used it in a spirit of indulgence, and then we began to see how really distinguished it was making our clothes appear. Now, as we look about at the passing winter styles and the ones for spring, we see innumerable touches of metal and some frocks and costumes made solely of this material.

Metal stuffs are charming in many more ways than one. They have a way of touching up a dress whenever so little a quantity is used so that it looks much more worthy of public attention than it did before the glittering trimming was added. Then, when they are used for whole garments, they are so distinguished looking that they make their wearers take on that same distinguished air. They need no trimmings. They cannot stand extra decorations. They are sufficient in themselves.

During the last winter the best-dressed women in New York have worn metal frocks for evening. One was able to pick them out as the most stunning of all the women in any room full of people. And in every instance the metal gowns were made so that their own materials were the center and the all of the gown's design. Now that spring styles are being shown at the American designers' places we see these metal materials appearing constantly in the collections—sure proof that the style is not going to lay down its hands just because spring is here, but that it has decided to go right on with its expression.

Used in Many Ways.

Not only dresses, but hats and blouses and negligees and accessories are made from stuffs showing silver and gold, when they are not entirely of the metalized materials. They take the draperies and the shapings in most interesting ways and because they require so little in the way of trimming they do not mount up in price as one might expect them to do.

The foreign metalized stuffs are the best. They crush in the hand so that they seem like nothing at all, and this in spite of their metal threads which are so carefully attended to that they defy the ravages of time and wear, retaining their glitter unto the bitter end. This is something to be looked after when buying fabrics containing gay silver or gold. If the threads tarnish quickly then the purchase is not by any means an economical one. If, on the contrary, they are of that sort which refuses to grow dim, then you can depend upon using them over and over again. And, if a stuff is intrinsically beautiful, it will last on and on through years, allowing itself to be shaped this way and that, according to the demands of the style of the moment.

Ribbons, too, are interestingly combined with metals when they are not made entirely from silks. Time and again you will see a strip of ribbon used where it looks for all the world like an insertion of handsome embroidery. These ribbons are a boon to the modern designer, for, with their edges finished with all fineness and care, they make the finish of a garment so simple a matter that they lure one to incorporate them in dressmaking, even when the natural tendency would be in an opposite direction.

Blouse Is Different.

The blouse of the moment is an interesting affair if only because it is so different a thing from the ones that have gone before. For a while, after the shirtwaist died as a general article of dress, the blouse seemed to be all in the world of dress. Now it is back again, carrying all before it. For, you see, the blouse of today is something which looks like an integral part of a dress instead of an individual element. It has succeeded in so harmonizing itself with the rest of the costume that, at first appearance, one would never realize that it could be detached and give up its place to another bodice effect creating a whole new costume.

Certain velvet and duvetyn frocks have shown some of the most interesting of bodices done in silver or gold, and it has been hard, always, to tell whether that blouse were a separate entity or something that was attached permanently to the skirt that went with it. Usually, though, upon examination, it was found to be a little perfect thing by itself ready to give up its place at any moment to a bodice which its wearer happened to think was better suited to the occasion in hand.

There is a silver material that is brocaded in effect without employing any extra coloring. It is all silver, but the pattern is raised or embossed, while the foundation fabric remains a flat silver. This is especially lovely for the draped smock to be worn with the black or colored skirt and to constitute a part of the three-piece costume. These bodices are made with short and tightly fitted sleeves. They are plain at the neckline, and, while they drape about the form, they are still left with their lower edges plain so that they drape into the folds of the skirt with every semblance of being attached to that lower portion of the costume.

Brocade for Evening Wear.

Sometimes these little bodices are made of gold and again they are made of bright brocades, but always they are seen to accompany suits of darker tones so that their own brilliance shall take the center of the stage and leave them to be noticed as the entire decoration of the garment.

Whole dresses of brocade are usually confined to the evening hours, for they are so very startling in their beauty that they are almost too dressy and gorgeous to be worn at any hour during the day. But it is a plain fact that when they are made up into evening frocks their lines are ever so simple and they produce almost the one-piece effect when you come right down to examining the principles upon which they are constructed.

Some of the evening golden dresses are draped, as are also the ones made of silver, and they are gathered in folds that follow the dictates of the individual figure, being made with trains and panels that help out most gloriously the sumptuousness of the effect. No trimmings are used—not even beads or ribbon, but the quality of the metal material is left to show for what it is worth and usually it succeeds in being distinctive no matter what obstructions may be put in its way. You cannot keep a metal gown from showing in a crowd. It simply insists that it shall be noticed and it carries its wearer along with it to recognition.

Hats of silver and gold are omnipresent. It is not at all unusual to see a toque made of rich metal brocade and when that is the case the material is left to do its work unaided unless there is a sparkling ornament of brilliants placed in the direct front. Then there are the little evening hats combined with lace and malines when they are not left alone to be simply metal cloth twisted about the head-dress. There is a new spring evening head arrangement which has a little turned-back gold brim that glistens through a single layer of brown malines. Then the malines, still in a single covering, is pulled over the top of the head to make the filmy crown of the hat and at the sides streamers of the tulle gathered together are left to take the place of trimming. This little trick can be done with all colors, but it is particularly charming with brown because the golden tints of the color chime in so happily with the glitter of the golden brim arranged underneath.

There are large hats made of fitted silver and gold cloth and then they are trimmed with tulle or lace to give that lightness of appearance which often the metal cloth seems to lack, especially when used for the making of a hat.
