

HAUL OUT MANURE ON DRY DAYS

Raleigh, Dec. 11.—Either haul out the manure and spread thinly on the fields planted to small grain or let it stay in the stables where it is packed down. Don't pile it out in a corner of the lot, where it loses all of its nitrogen as ammonia gas which escapes into the air.

"Any time during winter, when the ground is dry enough, is a good time to spread manure on small grain," says E. C. Blair, extension agronomist at State College. "This is better than to pile the manure outside of the barn. When piled loosely and exposed to weather, the manure is always damaged by certain bacteria which change the nitrogen to ammonia gas and this escapes into the air. Much of the value of the manure is thus lost. Leaching also plays a part in this loss of fertility."

Mr. Blair states that when manure is spread out on the fields, there is too little in one place for the destructive bacteria to become active. Rains will leach out the nitrogen, but it is carried into the soil, where it is so badly needed.

From the standpoint of the growing crop, the spreading of manure in winter is an excellent practice, states Mr. Blair. Even a light application will form a blanket that protects the young plants from cold. The value of the manure as a source of nitrogen is well known, but there is another point which should be remembered—if clover is to be sowed on the grain in the following spring, manure applied in winter will neutralize some of the acids in the soil, making it a better place for the clover. This feature is especially valuable on land not limed. In fact Mr. Blair states that manure acts somewhat like lime and its use has enabled many farmers to grow clover on land where it wouldn't catch before the manure was applied.

"If it is not convenient to haul out the manure to the field, by all means let it remain in the stable, where it will be packed down," recommends Mr. Blair.
