SOYBEAN SEED HARD TO BUY

Advise Farmers To Grow Own Seed of Certain Varieties

Because of the difficulty many farmers have experienced this season in finding good seeds of the Laredo, Otootan, and Virginia varieties of soybeans, it would be advisable this year to grow a supply of such seed on the home farm.

Many farmers have told us this year that it was almost impossible for them to find seed of some of the most desirable hay varieties, says E. C. Blair, extension agronomist at State College. Last year, such varieties as the Laredo, Otootan, and Virginia were so cheap that they almost went begging. They were widely planted and their superiority over the coarser-stemmed varieties for hay making was thoroughly proven. This year, the price per bushel has doubled, and even then a number of farmers will have to fall back on the old mammoth yellow.

The remedy for this situation, suggests Mr. Blair, is to grow a supply of planting seed at home. If the beans are planted in rows three feet apart, a bushel of seed will cover twice as much land as when drilled or broadcasted. The yield of hay will be larger, and if part of the plants are left to ripen, an abundant yield of seed may be secured.

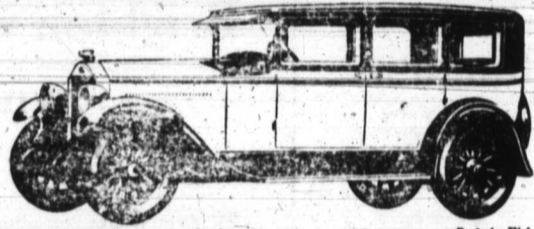

Mr. Blair states that a corn planter which will drop a seed every two or three inches will put in the soybean seed properly. Only two cultivations are usually necessary, and at harvest time the beans may be cut and threshed or a regular soybean harvester may be used. In either case, a yield of from 6 to 12 bushels per acre may be expected.

Experience has proved that soybean hay ranks next to alfalfa in value as a roughage for dairy cattle. The soybean will grow on land that is most too acid for alfalfa and will make good yields, especially when some of the small-stemmed varieties, such as suggested by Mr. Blair, are used.

Your little three-year-old stirs in the night, and his voice wakes you as he says, 'Daddy, hold my hand, please.' You reach out and draw his little bed near yours, and through the bars find his chubby hand. His baby fingers hold your hand tight, and holding it his fears are banished, his little restless spirit is quieted and he falls asleep.

That boy of yours will need your hand as he grows old enough to start to school. Your hands will be needed to supply the funds and food and clothes, to maintain a comfortable home. And as he continues to grow he will need your hands still. Yes, he will need them, and he has a right to ask 'Daddy' to hold his hand until he is prepared for the battle of life through proper education.

As you lie awake in the night thinking of the significance of that little affectionate cry, 'Daddy, hold my hand

'please,' you wonder if fate will be good enough to you to let you live until that precious boy is prepared for life, if you hold his hand on through. And there lurks the fear, Suppose I should be called to leave him!

There is a way to banish that fear, to remove that worry of the likelihood there will be no hands to work for him during the years he will need them. Modern life insurance has worked out a way. All you need to do is make use of it. Through its many different policies 'Daddy's' hands can go on holding just as long as they are needed—until that son of yours stands out equipped to take a man's part in life, and carry on for himself and mother.

If you are not holding your child's hand, call, write, or see me, and I will be glad to go over the matter with you, without cost or obligation on your part.
