Two Voices

Two mighty Voices speak to North Carolina and bid her lend them ear. One Voice says: "I speak in the name of Economy. Let us cut public school expenditures. Too long have We, the People, been spending more on education than We can afford. Our pocketbooks can not stand the burden of the present system. Retrenchment is in order."

The other Voice submits: "We are the Children of this State. As long as the average annual per capita expenditure for current expense in the public schools of North Carolina is only $35.20, as compared with $71.39 in the average State of the Union, the education we receive will not enable us to compete in the gam of Life, on equal terms, with children educated in other States. We remind you that to those best educated belong opportunities for ownership of property, directorships of industry, and leadership in all walks of Life. If you will give Us the chance to compete, We shall achieve these opportunities. The only way by which you can give Us the opportunity to "burgeon out all there is within us" is also the only way by which you can protect North Carolina for North Carolinians. If the boys and girls who live in North Carolina today are to own, direct, and lead North Carolina in the years to come, then North Carolina must keep pace, educationaly, with other States.—North Carolina Teacher.

CONSERVATION OF WOOD LAND IS ADVOCATED

District Forester L. A. Carter Says Farmers Should Practice Forestry

The farmers, more than any other class of people, should be vitally interested in the conservation and development of our forest or woods land, states L. A. Carter, District Forester for Northeastern North Carolina. As both producer and consumer, wood is indispensable to the farmer.

Statistics show that the farmer is the greatest user of wood in this country and in addition is one of the greatest woods land owners. About one-half of every farm is in woodland. In this northeastern part of North Carolina the majority of all forest land is owned by farmers as small separate tracts or as part of the farm.

For years the farmers have been endeavoring to take their farm lands more productive and have enlisted the aid of agricultural specialists to find better seed, better fertilizers and better cropping methods to increase the yield per acre of all the annual crops on one-half of their farm lands, but have failed to pay any attention to the timbered half of the farm. Timber is a crop and these wooded parts of the farm can be made to produce a crop at regular intervals just as much as the annual crop of corn, cotton or tobacco is produced regularly. Whether used for fire wood, posts, poles, lumber for farm buildings or sold in the log or on stumpage basis, the wood we take from the trees on the farm is of value to us.

The farmer that would be content to produce half a bale of cotton per acre would be hard to find, yet most farmers are content to let their woods lands produce what they will, if they will.

The average farm forest, however, is producing only one-third to one-half of what it is capable of producing. By giving some attention to the wooded half of his farm and by proper management or cultivation of this land, the farmer can produce at regular intervals a crop of wood that instead of just barely paying the tax on the land will give him a profit. And in cultivating his forest land, the farmer can at little cost increase, not only the rate of growth, but also, the quality and value of the crop received.

The first step in any program of development of the farm forest is securing the production of that land from destructive agencies. Of these, forest fires are the most frequent and the most destructive. Not only should precaution be taken to guard against firing the woods, but paths and fire lines should be kept open to provide easy access to these lands and to break the forest up into small tracts so that fires that do start may be more easily controlled.

Every acre of land should be fully stocked, no blank spaces, and if nature does not restock these acres when given a chance after fires have been eliminated, small seedlings can be transplanted to fill these blank spaces from over stocked areas.

In cutting out wood for posts, fire wood and other home uses, the condition of the forest can be improved if the wood trees, those of undesirable, slow growing species and those trees that are crooked or so overtopped that they will soon die, are used and the straight, fast growing, healthy trees are left to produce high quality timber.
