RURAL SECTIONS ARE NOW READY FOR CURRENT

Many Farms Well Located To Take Advantage Of Possibilities
The rural electrification of North Carolina will be an important step forward in the agricultural advancement of the State according to David S. Weaver, agricultural engineer at State College. Thousands of farms over the State are well situated to take advantage of the possibilities now awaiting development, he said, and the time is coming when these farms will be equipped with efficient and economical electrical appliances. Already there is a large potential source of power which may be obtained by extending rural transmission lines from the 49 municipally-owned plants now in operation. Still more power can be obtained by the development of hydro-electric plants along the many streams in the Piedmont area.

Before a transmission line can be erected with assurance of profitable operation, the farmers along the proposed right-of-way must guarantee the consumption of a reasonable amount of current for each mile of transmission line. Weaver said that in a number of communities the farmers are getting together and ascertaining how many of their number will use the current if a line is erected.
