The Governor's Recommendations

Governor Ehringhaus needs help. He will find plenty of critics of the program he outlined in his message to the General Assembly. We always do that, but what he really needs is constructive help.

He recommends a number of things which need to be done. Undoubtedly the most important is a larger school fund. His road and bridge recommendations are sound and need support. His request for a law authorizing and requiring all drivers of automobile to have license is good. Another excellent recommendation is that of ratifying the child labor amendment to the U. S. Constitution, which would prohibit for all time child labor in factories. His proposal to change the absentee ballot law is good. Unemployment insurance is one of our needs, and it is time to begin it in this legislature. Then there is his policy of school-book rental and free textbooks for all pupils.

All these principles are sound and would tend to improve our social system. Yet many of the recommendations will bump into strong opposition, mostly because we have a people who prefer wild personal extravagance in their expenditures rather than to pay a little more tax to build a better and safer system of government.

Our main business should be to take care of government and to meet the needs of the citizens.

Road Building Comes First

Of the proposals for public works presented by President Roosevelt in his message to the Congress, perhaps public road building is the most important, closely followed by the building of rural homes.

For immediate relief, the government can put every idle man in the country to working on the roads and pay them with appropriations already allotted for that purpose. And when we consider that road improvement will be the most universal help to the public of any other thing we can do, it becomes far more important. It will doubtless give more general satisfaction than if the money was spent in draining a few men's farms and for other selfish purposes.

On the Road to Ruin

Japan has at last set a course that will eventually mean her downfall. She has gone into the manufacture of automobiles.

She will invest a large part of her money in cars, gas, and oil, and what she lacks of starving to death she will make up for by killing the balance of the folks.

It is a good thing for the rest of the world. She will destroy herself within the speed limit.

"Tax the Other Fellow"

"Tax the other fellow" seems to be the guiding principle of taxation, and it is 99 per cent unanimous. This same principle is the cause of most of our troubles in government.

Too many folks want to stay at the milking end of the cow and too few are willing to stand at the feeding end.

It is apparent that we are now in for a long siege of tax-dodging argument, both in Raleigh and in Washington. Some of us would like to see big bonus bills, but no school support, and it makes no difference in which direction we look we find fellows—the tax-dodger, and at his side we find the fellow who wants to gather all he can from the public treasury.

One of our greatest needs is a conscience that will teach us the difference between right and wrong. We see those who have no conscience always willing to grab but never to give.

Public Health Program

A large number of health workers will meet in Raleigh at State College next week to discuss various health measures likely to come before the legislature. The names of many prominent men appear on the program, both from North Carolina and other states. Questions of great importance will be discussed.

We have already found about all the germs, both good and bad; we have found out all about vitamins, and about a lot of diseases. Still we die. It is up to medical science to find the reason why we are having more deaths among children than we did a few years ago. We need to know why four times as many children die under 1 years of age in North Carolina as die in Australia at the same age.

Our legislature needs to increase its appropriations for health service, and our schools need to teach the ill-effects of tobacco, alcohol, and other narcotics and habit-forming drugs on health.

Need an Even Start

We regret to hear that some landlords are reducing the acreage of their tenants. In fact, it is said in at least a few cases that the landlords have stopped their sons from school to give them a part of the acreage of former tenants, which gives the tenant scarcely enough to justify remaining on the farm.

We believe that more people need to go on farms, but when a man roots out a satisfactory tenant to give place for his kindred, whereby he may gobble up the big profits he hopes to receive because of the decreased acreage, we regard the act as hard and cold. But what will some men resort to for profit?

We all need an even start for a hard pull. If we do not get it, we will soon be back in the same old rut.

Too Much Politics Again

There seems to be rather too much politics getting into the recovery program. In some cases, among the higher-ups, you need to be kin to somebody or to have political prestige to land the best jobs. And then some of the lower-downs get on the relief rolls and stick so tightly and make so little effort to improve their own condition that it is impossible to shake them off.

Counting Costs

Stringent economy practiced by the last legislature has resulted in such deterioration of North Carolina's roads that it will cost $6,152,000 to put them back into such shape as they were two years ago, State Public Works Commissioner Capus Wayack estimates.

And how much will it cost to put the schools and the agencies of public health and public welfare, the institutions for the alleviation of suffering and the protection of the state, and the three units of the University back into such shape as they were two years ago?

Somebody might estimate the cost in dollars, but nobody can estimate the cost in the loss of values higher than dollars and more permanent even than holes in concrete.
